we'll have to answer. And one of the first I know will be about my early morning habits. You'll say, "Mommy, does every man go out at 6:30 in the morning and have breakfast somewhere else?"

And then your mother will probably say grimly, "Darling, every other daddy in the world except your daddy eats breakfast with his family. Your daddy is just different!"

Which will leave me in a fine hole. So I'd better explain it right now, even though you won't understand any more than your mother, because you're both women. But here it is:

Guys like to keep in shape. They like to have workouts in gymnasiums and steam baths and things, just because it makes them feel good. Well, most guys do it before dinner, but I like to do it before breakfast. So I hoist myself out of bed at 6:30 and drive to the Beverly Hills Athletic Club, where there are two other early birds like me. So we just work out, that's all. Then we go into the club kitchen and get ourselves breakfast of orange juice, coffee, toast and eggs, and then we wash up the dishes, and zingo! we're off to work. It's quite understandable—in spite of what you two dames may think!

But I know you'll understand, later on in life. Because I'm going to teach you how to work out, and how to fish and hunt and swim, and I'm going to take you in my truck up to my tungsten mine in the Piute Mountains near the Mojave Desert. A girl nowadays can be just like a boy—she can do anything. And I want you to grow up that way so you'll always be what you are now: natural. I know your mother is natural and I believe I am—and that is above all things the most important quality to have.

So hurry out of those doll dresses, pet. Your dad wants to make a man out of you!

August 20, 1943.

Judy, you queen among women! Two great things have happened today!

You were six months old—and you spoke your first word. It was "Uh-uh," and you said it with one blue eye sourly eyeing your spinach, and you shook your head the while.

You certainly talk a lot for your age, you know it? Maybe it means you'll grow up to be a female Walter Winchell. Or maybe it just means you'll grow up to be a female!

October 13, 1943.

Oh, Judy, your Dad is low enough in his mind to squeeze under the rug. Lower than he's ever been in his whole life long—even when he was starving to death in New York in the early days, or being eaten with loneliness in Hollywood before he met your mother.

I'm sick in a hospital in Chicago, two thousand miles from you. And five doctors have just gone and they don't know what's the matter with me—and I feel awful, physically, and worse mentally. I'm going over everything I've ever known of you, like a drowning man. My first glimpse of you through the plate glass window at the hospital—and the first time you sat in the palm of my hand (and it just fit you, too!), and I said to your mother, "Look! The little devil can use my hand for an armchair—yet I've already got the money socked away in bonds for her college education!" And the time I was carrying you past the white iron ducks on our lawn and you said, "Duck!" just as clear as clear. Seven months old you were then.

And the time, just a week ago before I left home to go on this USO camp tour when you first stood up, hanging on to your crib for dear life—eight months old! And the way your dinky mouth looks when you laugh, with those two silly teeth sticking out of it like a coyote's—and your blue eyes, full of mischief, and your brown curly hair as soft as eiderdown. All of it I remember now, quickly, and all of the things about your mother. The New Year's Eve we met nine years ago, when she was a singer at the Trocadero, and our two weddings—one in Mexico, one in Los Angeles—and our house and the magic she's done to all the rooms to make it into a home.

But I'll stop now. I shouldn't be writing this, only I couldn't help it. Just so you'd know some day what I was thinking, just in case.

September 1, 1943.

Well, I just built a chicken house for you, for those two funny looking bantam chickens that one of my friends just gave you. And I'm big as life and twice as healthy, and I could kick myself for the gloomy things I was writing only two weeks back in Chicago.

Honey, all I had was kickbacks from some sulfa drugs I took for a cold. It boils down to that. And when I think how they had to cart me to the Chicago station on a stretcher—and how weak as a kitten I was on the train coming west to you—and how I dragged myself off at Kansas City to buy you a teddy bear in the station, thinking, "This is my last present for her!" The whole thing makes me wince, now that I'm in my overalls again, hammering a chicken coop together! But when you're older, you'll find out that when a healthy ox like me gets packed into a hospital, he hears a funeral march playing in his ears far louder than any chronic invalid.

Tomorrow I'm building you a play pen, with wheels so we can move it around. I got the wheels in a second hand shop when I thought we weren't going to be able to get hold of a baby carriage for you, thanks to wartime shortages—and now they're going to be useful, after all! And I'm painting the thing white, with the left over paint from your addition to the house.

Like the sounds of it? You'd better, Judith Ann! I'm a big strong man again, baby, and I won't take any back talk from you!

December 25, 1943.

Christmas time, Judith Ann—your very first. Marjorie and I stayed up half the night working on your little Christmas tree, and came down hollow-eyed this morning to watch your reaction. Christmas trees mean a lot to me, because I never had any until I was married. I was an only child, and a poor one, and my parents couldn't see the point—so I wanted to watch my only child see her first one, and I hoped you'd take it big.

And baby, you didn't let me down! You threw out those two-bit sized hands of yours and burst into that little hysterical yelp you give that means you're delighted, and then you said, clear as a bell, "Happy!" Just like that. So Marjorie and I both got a half-nelson on you and each other and stood there like a couple of happy idiots, laughing and hugging.

So then we let you scuttle over to all your toys under the tree. And we watched you, and held hands, and Marjorie said, "Darling, we've got every present Santa could possibly give us."

And I said, "For this Christmas, yes. For next Christmas, no."

So then she looked at me, and so did you, just as if you understood and the two of you were lining up sides against me—and I explained. I said, "For next Christmas, I'd like another little Judy. Same size, same style, same sex!"

Which is just what I would like. But for right now, my little daughter, you're everything a guy could want in all the world. And you're certainly enough for this one!

COULD THIS BE AN OPTION ON LOVE?

Deanna Durbin (see pictures of her home, page 58) has a very new secret heart-throb. The gentleman is Robert Landry, very handsome, young and distinguished as a war photographer. Before handsome Bob went overseas he had photographed Deanna many times. Thus, while Deanna knew him, it wasn't until after her separation that she really noticed him. Bob had returned from a grizzly war assignment in Africa and Sicily, and was preparing for his takeoff to England for a new assignment, when a friend took him to Deanna's house one evening to attend a small party. After that the star and the photographer were inseparable, until it was time for the cameraman to board his plane on the first leg of his overseas hop. Deanna went to the airport with him. Frequent phone calls came through to her from New York, while Bob waited for transportation there—and finally a cable for her from England, when he arrived.

No one knows just what may happen.

Deanna's divorce will not be final until the last part of the year. By that time Mr. Landry may have returned from his assignment. But right now Deanna writes a letter every day and eagerly greets the postman when he turns up the driveway. For your information Bob Landry is about six feet, has dark brown hair, nice laughing blue eyes, and wears glasses.

before the war, from Ty Power, that I wanted to do a look-see for myself.

But even if it was a vacation, I couldn't keep myself away from the movie industry. This was the Mexican movie industry, to be sure, very young and untried compared to ours, but vividly interesting.

I speak only about six Spanish phrases, but that didn't bother me in getting around, for they've borrowed our movie phrases wholesale south of the border. "Spots," "mikes," "camera," "lights," "hold it for a still," "okay for sound." You hear those words and orders shouted in perfect English on the sets and stages, which are also called just that—and here and there, too, you see familiar faces.

In a narrow, crowded street in Cuernavaca, for example, some two hours away from Mexico City, I saw a light-haired girl approaching me, grinning. Beside her, a man in what Californians call Balboa blues was also grinning. It was Sally Blane and Norman Foster, down there shooting a new film. They've signed up in Mexico for a year, bringing their daughter, Gretchen (who is, of course, named for Aunt Loretta Young whose real name is Gretchen, too), and their furniture with them.

With the brilliant Mexican editor and pretty Mexican starlet, Marta Elba, I drove out to a vast estate where some forgotten Spanish millionaire once lorded it over the countryside. It was now a setting for "Nana," the famous Zola story, in which Lupe Velez is starred.

I must confess that it wasn't until I saw Lupe in the exquisitely alluring costumes of "Nana" that I realized how we have wasted her beauty and talent in this country on those "Spitfire" productions. The fiery Velez, who has wit and charm plus a very lively intelligence, was aware of it, though—which was the only reason she had returned to her native country to impersonate the Zola heroine. She hopes the film will be shown in this country. Having watched a sequence being shot, I hope so, too, for Lupe's work had a subtlety and a depth of feeling that utterly surprised me.

In fact, seeing her against the background of her own country, I realized again how talent overcomes all barriers of poverty, language or setting. Guadalupe Velez was born without any material advantages, or, to be more accurate about it, with every material disadvantage. But she did have brains and personality, and she has used both those gifts magnificently.

Lupe Velez is very obviously "that way" about Arturo de Cordova, and it's said they'll be married, soon as his divorce is final.

LETTER FROM A BOY IN THE SERVICE

$5.00 LETTER

While located in Camp Joseph T. Robinson, Arkansas, I was one of the fortunate soldiers to see Cary Grant in "Show Time at the Roxy." Before his arrival, the strong foothold he retains through the admiration of fans was exhibited in opinions regarding his personality and acting ability.

There were remarks of "A regular guy's coming to camp . . . Wasn't he tops in 'Suspicion?' . . . Remember 'The Awful Truth?' "

The Field House where the show took place was filled to capacity long before curtain call. It was a gay, light, entertaining affair, with chorus girls, singing personalities, and comedians.

Finally, Cary was ushered before us. The whole place was a scene of whistling, shouting and applauding, without restraint. When the opportunity allowed him to speak, the house was intent on hearing his sincere efforts to do his part in making the armed forces happy with his showmanship.

The night was eventful. The welcome accorded to Cary shall never be forgotten. It remains as glowing proof of the appreciation the armed forces are showing toward Hollywood's all-out effort to keep up morale.

MOVIELAND'S NEW PICTURE GUIDE

THE DESERT SONG (Warners) brings back snatches of the lovely Sigmund Romberg music which Dennis Morgan and Irene Manning sing. But the fifteen-year-old operetta has had its face lifted not too becomingly. It now seems that the Nazis were behind the plot to enslave the freedom-loving Riffs, and the French were merely unwitting tools in building a vital railway line in Morocco by which Germany planned to benefit. It is hard to believe that the scheme was upset by an American piano player who masqueraded as El Khobar, the Red Shadow.

Things were much better when "The Desert Song" did not try to be an anti-Axis anthem and was content simply to give voice to the charming Romberg melodies. Dennis Morgan proves that he is just the lad to sing a love lyric with the best of them. There is also a certain amount of dash in the character he portrays who leads swift-riding horsemen across the flaming sands, in vivid Technicolor. It is likewise a pleasure to renew memories of that prince of comedians, the late Lynne Overman. Bruce Cabot is a formidable heavy who realizes the error of his collaboration with the villainous Victor Françen in the Nazi-inspired slave trade. It all adds up to a beautiful, yet frequently empty entertainment which can be taken or left alone, depending on how you are feeling this evening.

JACK LONDON (United Artists) fails to satisfy what admirers of the author and his books will have reason to expect of his screen biography. It lacks excitement because it is merely a literary picture about a literary figure, and misses the lusty, roaring life of the man who was really Jack London. Glossed over are the circumstances which awakened the urge to write in the rough and ready crusader who won his reputation with "Call of the Wild." The greater part of the film is devoted to giving an audience smug assurance that London was one of the first Occidentals to learn of Japan's dream of world conquest. He became aware of the "Yellow Peril" because a Jap officer boasted, yet might have been talking through his hat. It happened when London was a war correspondent in Korea and Theodore Roosevelt was president. So all of America is indicted for not anticipating what happened at Pearl Harbor two generations later.

Michael O'Shea creates a physically able portrait of London and he is not to be blamed for the shortcomings of the drama. Nor is Susan Hayward, who plays Charmian. Yet when the movie comes to a convenient theatre, your time will be better spent with a Jack London novel.

THREE RUSSIAN GIRLS (United Artists) commemorates the heroism of Soviet women who serve as nurses in the front lines. The story was originally filmed in Russia and called "The Girl from Leningrad." Remade in Hollywood, Anna Sten, Mimi Forsaythe and young Kathy Frye play the new title roles, and their performances make this a worth-seeing picture of appealing simplicity. It may well open a fresh career for Anna Sten and surely establishes one for just-'teen-age Kathy Frye. Kent Smith and Alexander Granach are the men importantly concerned.

The plot opens with the mobilization of a group of volunteer nurses bravely answering the call of their country. The Nazi invaders are threatening the city and the women are rushed to a temporary hospital on the front which has to be abandoned when winter comes. But three nurses stay on to continue their valiant work as a ski unit. Some fine factual battle footage in the snow enlivens the latter episodes, and the

PREVIOUSLY RECOMMENDED PICTURES YOU SHOULD SEE

MADAME CURIE (MGM) Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon as Marie and Pierre Curie play an exquisite love drama to the accompaniment of the discovery of radium. A picture due to be a strong contender for several Academy Awards this year.

HAPPY LAND (20th Century-Fox) an inspiring reavowal of treasured American memories, which you dare not miss seeing and remembering. Don Ameche in a performance that will surprise you.

LOST ANGEL (MGM) little Margaret O'Brien in a little tender, heartwarming entertainment that is a joy to behold.

HIGHER AND HIGHER (RKO) just because it is a musical which allows the one and only Frank Sinatra to do justice to his fame.

JANE EYRE (20th Century-Fox) Charlotte Brontë's novel of a woman's love comes to the screen as a classic drama superbly performed by Joan Fontaine. No woman will ever forget it.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE (Warners) Bette Davis and Miriam Hopkins pit their acting skills in a nip and tuck display of friendship.

GUADALCANAL DIARY (20th Century-Fox) from the Richard Tregaskis book, this factual picture smashingly fulfills its obligation to history.

PRINCESS O'ROURKE (Warners) a sparkling modern Cinderella comedy in reverse. Olivia de Havilland, Robert Cummings and Charles Coburn.

CORVETTE K-225 (Universal) a salute to those scrappy little warships of the Canadian Navy which have been the most effective weapon against U-boats. Sea-worthy.

FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (Paramount) a pretentious depiction of Hemingway's Spanish story. Gary Cooper, Ingrid Bergman and Katina Paxinou.

There's nothing rusty about "Dusty" Anderson, a beauty of the perfect outdoor type. She's a smart girl, too—which is what Hollywood seeks in addition to a pretty face. Set for "natural" roles, she also shows a flair for comedy; has an enthusiasm for life, plus a determination to make good—and she will.

Eileen McClary was chosen for young college-type roles because she has no affectations. When she was given a screen test she showed considerable dramatic aptitude, though she had had no dramatic training. One of the youngest in the group, she is suitable for unsophisticated parts—the likely ingenue.

The SURVIVORS

Here are four beautiful models who were transplanted from hurry scurry New York to the sunny coast of California. They were brought out with eleven other nationally looked-at lovelies to take part in Columbia's "Cover Girl", starring Rita Hayworth. Four out of the fifteen remain in Hollywood with contracts clutched in their little warm hands. This is a very large percentage—four out of fifteen—but for each of the girls there are special reasons for their being selected as starring material.

Susann (accent on the last syllable) Shaw is a versatile actress. She belonged to dramatic clubs in school at Pasadena, and has a nice soprano voice. Although she'll appeal to women, too, she's fundamentally a man's gal. A congenital rebel with a lot of fire, despite the dewy-eyed look.

B. J. Graham (her name is Betty Jane) looks like a typical American girl. She is considered by many as the most beautiful of the group. Because she is lovely without makeup, she is of a new era. Wide brows, clear eyes and a straight upper lip make her different looking. And—she can act!

WORDS of MUSIC

by JILL WARREN

THE TUNEFILMS:

Paramount has sunk a tidy little sum into their technicolor super-special, "Lady In The Dark," but it appears to have been worth it. Ginger Rogers is the star, with no less than three leading men: Ray Milland, Jon Hall and Warner Baxter. All the wonderful music from the original New York show has been retained, plus a new one by Johnny Burke and Jimmy Van Huesen, "Suddenly It's Spring." The dance numbers, directed by Don Loper, are excellent. Though it's been four years since she has danced on the screen, Ginger shows that she can still make with the feet. She does a ballroom number with Loper and also a solo Charleston. The big musical high note is the "Saga of Jenny" which Ginger sings for all she is worth . . . and that's singing it!

Twentieth Century-Fox' latest rhythm flicker is "Pin-Up Girl," Betty Grable's last film before the arrival of her baby. It's full of fun, frolic and swing, what with Martha Raye, Joe E. Brown and Charlie Spivak and his band in the cast list. And the music is something. There are two haunting ballads which are sure to have a long stay on the hit parade, "Time Alone Will Tell," and "Once Too Often." Be sure to listen for the wonderful Spivak trumpet on "Time Alone." Then there is a cute number, "Don't Carry Tales Out Of School," which Betty sings with the Spivak band. "Yankee Doodle Hayride" is the big swing number of the picture and be sure to listen for the effective duet Martha Raye does with Charlie. All in all it's a film for your "must" list. . . .

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Before I give you the hot news from the wax front, don't forget that the release dates may vary in different sections of the country due to transportation difficulties and all that sort of thing. So if you can't get the record you want just when you want it, be patient—it'll be along.

Now for the goodies. Get a load of these new ones from the Capitol Company. The result of Stan Kenton's first recording date is a happy one—"Do Nothing Till You Hear From Me," Duke Ellington's latest ballad, and "Harlem Folk Dance," an instrumental. "Do Nothing" is sung by Kenton's carrot-topped saxophonist, Red Dorris. "Folk Dance" is an original by Kenton with a typical Kenton arrangement. There are two swell trumpet solos, the first by Karl George, who was with the original Teddy Wilson band, and the second by John Carroll. Kenton just uses a three-man rhythm section so the only piano you will hear on the record is a short interlude by Stan himself. Which is unusual, considering he has nine brass, including five trumpets. Red Dorris' tenor sax is also heard on this side.

Margaret Whiting is no longer the regular vocalist with Freddie Slack's band, but she still records with him. Their latest combined effort is "Silver Wings In The Moonlight." This is the pop ballad which is number one on England's hit parade. On the reverse side of this is an instrumental, "Furlough Fling," which heavily features Slack's 88 and Barney Bigard's clarinet.

If you like good cowboy music, Capitol has it for you in Tex Ritter's newest. It's "Have I Stayed Away Too Long?" and "There Is A Gold Star In Her Window." The first tune was written by Frank Loesser and looks like a solid hit. Ritter sings the vocals for both.

"I don't want to be an Absentee —but what's a girl to do?"

I know how important it is to stay on the job. So do plenty other women who miss work on "trying days". We know how much our plant—our country—depends on us, when every minute counts! But how can we keep going, at times when we feel like this?

Gives advice for older women; and for when the stork's expected. Tells about tampons. And how to get more comfort from your sanitary napkins.

"That Day Is Here Again" is the answer to an S. O. S. from a war plant nurse. She reports that their greatest number of absentees are women who miss 1 to 3 days every month, frequently on "trying days". To aid these workers, and the war effort, Kotex offers this helpful handbook free of charge to all women!

Paul Sells does the accordion solos, and he also made the arrangements.

Capitol's first album is one I'm sure you'll want to own—"Songs by Johnny Mercer." There are eight of Johnny's greatest tunes, and the titles will only serve to remind you what a great writer that Mercer is: "Jamboree Jones," "You And Your Love," "You Grow Sweeter As The Years Go By," "Nodaway Road," "Blues In The Night," "Too Marvelous For Words," "I'll Remember You," and "Dixieland Band." The vocal department is handled by Johnny himself, Jo Stafford and The Pied Pipers, backed up by Paul Weston's orchestra. . . . You jazz fans will be glad to learn that Capitol has big plans for a swell album entitled "American Jazz." It won't be released for some time but I thought you'd like to hear about it now. Just take a gander at the lineup of musicians, and you'll see what I mean. Jack Teagarden, trombone; Joe Sullivan, piano; Dave Barbour, guitar; Jimmy Noone, clarinet; Artie Shapiro, bass; Billy May, trumpet; Dave Matthews, tenor sax; and Zutty Singleton on drums. The singing duties will be divided between Teagarden and Peggy Lee. . . .

Now we'll move over to Decca. They have made some terrific albums, the first of which is the whole score from the great show, "Oklahoma." The members of the original cast sing the songs, with the same orchestra and chorus, so if you can't afford a ticket to New York to see the show, these records look like the next best thing. My favorite tunes are "People Will Say We're In Love" and "Surrey With The Fringe On Top," but there are twelve sides in all, so I'll let you take your pick.

If you saw "For Whom The Bell Tolls," you remember the sensational musical score by Victor Young. Well, Decca has put the whole thing, just as it was in the picture, into an album, with Young conducting the orchestra. It isn't swing, but it's definitely worth having.

We switch back to rhythm again with another album—all the Gershwin songs from "Girl Crazy," done by Judy Garland, and of all people, Mickey Rooney. They're really swell. Judy does "Embraceable You," "But Not For Me," "I've Got Rhythm," and "Bidin' My Time." Personally, I think they are the best platters she has ever made. This is the first time Mickey has ever made a commercial record, but he does a fine job of it. He sings a double number with Judy, "Could You Use Me," and one solo, "Treat Me Rough." On this one he gives out with licks and everything. The arrangements were made by Conrad Salinger, who is considered to be just about the best arranger in Hollywood. On "I've Got Rhythm" there is some terrific piano work by a colored boy, Calvin Jackson. Leo Diamond's harmonica band is behind Judy on "Bidin' My Time."

Well, there it is kiddies—break the piggy bank and buzz down to your nearest music store, and I hope you don't get stepped on in the rush. . . .

EARMARKS OF HITS:

Up and down Vine Street the talk is all about a new hillbilly tune, "San Fernando Valley," by the conductor-composer Gordon Jenkins. The wise boys say it's going to be one of 1944's biggest hits. Evidently the publishers think so too because they gave Jenkins a thousand dollar advance before the tune was even played on the air.

Private Frank Loesser of the Air Corps received a citation from Henry Morgenthau for his song, "What Do You Do In The Infantry?" It has been chosen as the official song by two Infantry divisions and will also be the theme for the Fifth Canadian War Loan Drive. The pair of marching shoes shown on the cover of the sheet music belong to Loesser's pal, Private Milton De Lugg, also of the Air Corps, who in civilian life was the swing accordionist with Matty Malneck's band. . . . Harry Nemo and Eddie De Lange have teamed up for a new ballad called "Have You A Love To Go With That?" Frank Sinatra has been singing it, and a song can't go wrong when that boy does it. Nemo will be remembered as the author of "'Tis Autumn."

When Jeff Clarkson, Les Brown's piano player, was sixteen years old, he wrote a song with his father entitled "Home." At that time nothing much happened, but the publishers have revived it and I think you'll be hearing it a lot on the air. . . .

ON THE BEAM:

Dick Todd has been made a regular member of the Blue Network's "Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street." . . . Lionel Hampton and his band are now heard on the Blue's "Soldiers of Production" Sunday series. He has a seventeen-piece outfit and of course he features his Vibraharp. . . . I wish they'd let Stan Kenton be heard a little more on the Bob Hope program. The guy plays such sensational piano but it never appears on that show. . . . If you're a Connie Haines fan you can hear her several times a week on fifteen minute sustainers over the Blue Network. Of course she is still the songstress on the Abbott-Costello program. . . . Have you heard any of the shows from the Santa Ana Air Base in California over the Mutual Network? They have a swell jazz outfit featuring Mannie Klein's trumpet. . . . Freddy Martin is the new music man on the Jack Carson air-frolic over C.B.S. . . . Another Martin, Nora by name, and no relation to Freddy, has been a click on Eddie Cantor's program. . . . Keep your eye on Georgia Gibbs, the vocal girl on the Jimmy Durante-Gary Moore clambake. I heard her introduce "Shoo Shoo, Baby" a few months ago and became a fan right then and there. . . .

JAM NOTES:

Red Nichols, whose "Five Pennies" were a big hit several years ago, has come out of retirement and is in Hollywood building up a new band. . . . When Helen Forrest played her first solo engagement in New York she did so with a new hairdo and a new salary. She is now a redhead and her weekly pay check is about ten times bigger than it was when she was with Harry James. Incidentally, something happened at the last moment and Helen Ward didn't join Harry. I, for one, was disappointed because she has always been one of my favorites.

Tommy Ryan has been doing okay as a band leader. He took over the baton of the Blue Barron band when Barron went into the army. Tommy's former boss, Sammy Kaye, gave him his blessings and a lot of timely tips on how to be a successful leader. . . . Lina Romay, Xavier Cugat's glamorous songstress, was married in California on Thanksgiving day to John Adams, a stock broker.

Ella Mae Morse has been doing great business on her first theater tour as a soloist. . . . In spite of suffering terribly with arthritis and being warned by his doctors to take it easy, Kay Kyser did all his holiday broadcasts from big desert camps and played many, many shows for soldiers stationed at isolated sections. . . . Jimmy Cash, the singer on the Burns and Allen air show, has been signed for Universal's forthcoming film, "Cross Your Fingers." It will be his first appearance before a movie camera.

Teddy Powell's band has been called the "Surprise Band of the Year" and he lived up to his billing when he opened at the Hollywood Palladium in December. The band is one of the best to be heard on the coast in a long while. I was particularly impressed with the brass section, especially one Dick Mains, who plays a whale of a trumpet. Teddy's vocalists, Gene Howard and Peggy Mann, are both fine. Powell was as excited as a kid opening night. "This is the first time we've been out here," he told me, "and I want the kids to like us." Well, relax, Teddy—they did. Right in the middle of the crowd in front of the bandstand I bumped into Sammy Kaye, who seemed to be enjoying the proceedings immensely. He told me he was having a lot of fun because it's so seldom he can get out on a dance floor and just be one of the customers. The Kaye band has been signed by Charles Rogers for a big spot in the new picture. "The Song of The Open Road."

Calvin Jackson, formerly one of Harry James' arrangers, has joined the M-G-M music staff. Incidentally, Harry has added four fiddles, bringing his string section up to thirteen. . . . Billie Rogers, the young girl with a horn, has been leading her own small band around the middle west. When Billie went with Woody Herman a couple of years ago she became the first girl musician ever to be featured with a big name band.

Andy Russell, who is coming up fast as a singer, has been signed to record under the Capitol label. Capitol also signed Eddie Miller and his orchestra. This is the old Bob Crosby Dixieland bunch, and they are going to wax a series of tunes. . . . Have you heard Kay Armen? She is a new artist recording for Decca and she hails from the same home town as one Dinah Shore—Nashville, Tennessee. . . . Peggy Lee, Benny Goodman's former thrush, is the proud mother of a seven-pound baby girl, born Caesarian in Los Angeles, November 11. Peggy has named the child Nicki. The happy father is the ex-Goodman guitarist, Dave Barbour. Since leaving Benny, Dave has been working on radio shows in Hollywood. Personally, I'd like to see Peggy go back with her old boss, but I don't think she wants to travel any more. . . . Freddy Martin has been signed to remain at the Cocoanut Grove at the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles for the duration of the war. . . .

BY COBINA WRIGHT, Jr.

Dinah came to Hollywood and love came to Dinah. A romance that bloomed altar-wise, with three days for a honeymoon

I PLAYED CUPID TO DINAH SHORE AND GEORGE MONTGOMERY

George and Dinah, on one of their rare nights out, exchange greetings at the Mocambo with Bob (Seabiscuit) Howard.

I AM a perpetual matchmaker. You've heard descriptions of "old matchmaking women." That's a description of me, at twenty-two. Let boy meet girl in my presence and I mentally start marching them to the altar. What I shall be at forty I hardly dare think. The officious, beaming Head of The Lonely Hearts Bureau, probably.

My excuse for this romantic meddling is that I am so blissfully married that I want every other girl to experience the same type of happiness. Even though my husband, Palmer Beaudette, is separated from me by the Pacific Ocean, Australia and several assorted islands, and even though I know the loneliness and fears of other war wives, I still think marriage is a perfect state.

Thus I simply couldn't restrain my impulse to be Danielle Cupid to Dinah Shore and George Montgomery. After all, Dinah is one of my very best friends and George is my good-luck hero. What's more, for months Dinah and I had been rationing one another on our conversations concerning George and Palmer. For every half hour of chatter about Palmer and my baby, I allowed Dinah a half hour of "isn't he wonderful" about George.

But to say that I led them to the altar at near dawn of the morning of December 4th, 1943, is to be too, too glamorous. What I did, together with two couples, besides the love birds (me along, the extra woman like other war wives these days, too) was to lead the bemused Dinah and George into the chilliest, dustiest office you ever saw, and stand them up before one of the nicest judges. The place was Las Vegas, Nevada, and poor Dinah was so cold that she nearly matched the blue bridal gown she wore.

If I'm going to tell this story properly, however, I'd better get back to the beginning.

It was love at first sight of George for Dinah, even though they hadn't met. George was in the screen and Dinah was in the audience, but Dinah sighed, "I'm going to like that guy when I meet him."

Today I can be very superior with Dinah by pointing out that I knew her dream man before she did. Like her, I felt I liked him from the moment I saw him. The difference was that he distinctly did not go for me.

There was a sound reason for that. It was midsummer of 1939 and I had just arrived at Twentieth Century-Fox for my first film test. George, being between pictures, had gone to his Montana ranch. So you can imagine his joy when he was called back to stand in on that test with me. He loathed me and made no effort to hide the fact.

The test, however, was okayed and I got superstitious about him. I felt as long as he was around I couldn't fail, and every time I got a role in a picture, I'd go discuss it with him. I guess he gradually decided I was an innocent who meant no harm, for he was sweet and sincere in all his advice. Mother invited him to a couple of cocktail parties. He came, and after that we were really friends.

It slays Dinah and me today but we cannot remember where we first met. We think it was at one of the Eddie Cantor broadcasts, but we know certainly it was in New York. But we never became really acquainted until we were both in San Francisco at the time of the George Gershwin memorial concert.

But the way Frances Rose Shore and Cobina Wright, Jr., cottoned to one another from that time on was really a thing. It took me about half a day to learn what a romantic girl this Frances Rose, now Dinah, was. She dreamed of The One Man and a wedding, duly presided over by her father, in which Moonlight and Magnolias would be prominently featured, with mint juleps flowing at the wedding breakfast faster than water over Niagara.

The morning after the Las Vegas rites, with Dinah wearing the platinum ring which makes the whole thing official.

So what did she get? She got a wedding breakfast of dried up lettuce and tomato salad, cold toast with margarine and a glass of milk in a place elegantly called "The Failing Elk."

Dinah met George at the Hollywood Canteen. There couldn't be any two people more alike than Dinah and George. Neither one of them drinks. Neither one of them smokes. They care almost nothing at all for night clubs. They both are wonderful cooks. They are as completely unspoiled and genuine as it is humanly possible to be, particularly considering their fame, and they want a home and children more than any other thing in the world.

From the day of their first meeting, they dated every single night that George was home on furlough, and their letters flew back and forth every day they were separated. As Hollywood courtships go, it was a long one, continuing over more than a year, and their love was tested by both proximity and separations, and grew steadily stronger under every hazard.

I guess I started living Dinah's life, while I was waiting to have my baby and Palmer so far away from me, because I was so lonely. We took Spanish lessons together daily, and planned the decoration of our homes, above that fifty-fifty chatter concerning the amazing virtues of the men we loved.

The Monday night before their wedding, George came back on a ten-day furlough from action in the North Pacific. I didn't know he had returned, and expecting Dinah for dinner, I was very shocked to open the door and discover her locked in a soldier's embrace. When I saw it was George, my matchmaking instincts really got going. Tuesday night, together with Dinah's two girlhood chums, Rufus and Shirley, who came with her to Hollywood, and their grand men and me, that extra war wife, we all had dinner, a wonderful spaghetti dinner which George cooked without so much as a nod from any woman. I looked at Dinah sitting at the head of the table, her eyes glowing. I looked at George opposite her, beaming like a lighthouse. I decided something had to be done.

"Why don't you two elope Saturday before George goes back?" I asked.

George just gazed at me, speechless. Dinah said, "Why, I can't! I'd miss our Spanish lesson!"

Dinah said, "Why I couldn't possibly. How would I get a dress?"

Dinah said, "How would we get away with it? How would we get the license and the ring?"

Said I, right in my element, "Leave it to me. I'll fix everything."

I really did, too. I called Las Vegas and found out the justice and all that. For something old I got one of Shirley's handkerchiefs. For something blue, I got a blue garter of Rufus', to (Continued on page 75)

Dinah at the Hollywood Canteen—which, incidentally, is where she first met George. Not where she first fell in love with him, though. He had been her screen idol, and she was the little gal sighing with admiration.

Cobina Wright, Jr. (Mrs. Palmer Beaudette), without whom the wedding might never have taken place. She arranged it all.

Love Story...

CAGNEY TWENTY-YEAR-OLD VARIETY

Proving that fame, poverty, and wealth can't separate two people who really adore one another.

All the comforts of home. This is to make up for the lean, hard vaudeville days, when a living was hard to make.

Jimmy and Billie Cagney find their places at the Academy Award dinner where Jimmy received the Oscar for his part in "Yankee Doodle Dandy."

BY VIVIAN COSBY

IF THERE is one principal thing the trouble with love in Hollywood—and Daniel J. Cupid has a terrible time in glamour village—it is that all Hollywood romance is so new. Hollywood's great loves six days of the week are those which started yesterday and end tomorrow. Love at first sight is chronic out here, all too swiftly followed by disillusion on the first morning in the honeymoon dinette.

So here is a story that is the glittering exception, the story of a stellar love that is twenty years romantic. And it concerns not a dignified pair of character people, but a gentleman who has stayed in the top ten bracket for many a season and who is still there. It concerns a guy with whom the ladies of the audience have always looked upon with favor, and not entirely for his acting ability, either. And it concerns the star's wife who is, and always was, cute as a button.

Their names today are Jimmy and Billie Cagney, and

The lord and master of the driveway of the house he and Billie dreamed about twenty years ago before they were married.

their personal life couldn't be happier, and this is the story of how they got and stayed that way.

Cut back to the early fall of 1923, to Broadway which was then the center of the theatrical world, and to a rainy night at eleven-thirty p.m.

Jimmy Cagney, a nineteen-year-old chorus boy in the musical comedy, "Pitter Patter," stood at the stage door, watching the rain pour down in torrents. Being without an umbrella and not having enough spare cash to hail a cab, he was wondering how he could get to his hotel without drenching his one and only good suit.

One of the chorus girls came to the door. Jimmy had already noticed that she was cute, but her main attraction at this moment was the fact that she was carrying an umbrella. With a little friendly conversation he discovered they were stopping at the same hotel. So naturally 'they shared her umbrella.

This walk in the rain was the start of the courtship

Just off the living room is Jimmy's den where it certainly looks as if a man could pick up a lot of information and entertainment in his spare moments of Jimmy Cagney and Billie Vernon. By way of a big splurge Jimmy took Billie to a lunch room that night. Over coffee and doughnuts Jimmy told Billie his dreams. Some day he was going to own a farm (a strange fancy for a boy from the sidewalks of New York). Some day he was going to be wealthy. Billie listened that night and agreed with all of it. She thought it was fine. She listened night after night, in different lunch rooms, but always having the same menus and the same dreams. Billie was sure nobody had ever dreamed such dreams before, and Jimmy was positive no girl was ever as sensitive and sweet and all-around endearing as Billie.

In other words they were in love, like ten million other pairs of young lovers before and after them.

When there was no matinee Billie and Jimmy went window shopping—not at department stores but antique shops, for Jimmy was (and still is) crazy about old things. For fun they planned a Cape Cod house they would some day build and furnish with New England antiques.

They were married when the show "Pitter Patter" closed. Billie claims the name of the show and the fact their courtship started on a rainy night was a bad omen for the first years of their marriage. For those years were filled with rainy days—and many meatless ones not sanctioned by the government.

Their luck was so thoroughly bad it would have wrecked their marriage if they hadn't been such perfect companions. They spent their honeymoon rehearsing an act for vaudeville. Looking back on it now, they both realize the act was an invitation to starvation. But at that time they were young, ambitious, and over confident. At the opening of the act Billie was on stage. Jimmy, wearing a tight suit, a little straw hat, a black tie, and trick collar, made his entrance. Billie would haul off and knock him down.

"What's the matter," Jimmy said.

"Sorry," replied Billie, "I thought you were someone else."

The dialogue was all like that, which should give you an idea of why they ate irregularly. After a few seasons of hit and miss bookings, Billie began to do some serious thinking. It seemed to her the James Cagneys were getting nowhere . . . but fast. She looked the situation straight in the face. She was a good dancer but nothing sensational. Jimmy was the more talented. But she knew he was a very unfunny comic. She felt, however, he was an excellent actor.

One evening she told Jimmy that they should go to New York. Here Billie would open a dancing school. Jimmy could storm producers' offices for a chance in a dramatic show. She argued they could have a home even if it was only one room. As for starving, they could achieve this just as easily in one spot as they could roaming about the country—besides they would save the wear and tear on their clothes and bodies. Billie told it all jokingly, and Jimmy didn't have to be argued with to give up their tawdry existence.

Back in New York Billie and Jimmy were much happier. True, the first shows Jimmy appeared in did not pay much salary, nor did his performances cause the critics to lose a night's sleep—nevertheless the Cagneys had now planted some roots. They had a cute, small, though very dark, apartment; they quickly made friends and Jimmy was gaining valuable experience.

When Jimmy was not working, and if the financial department could take it, they would get tickets in the gallery for all the Broadway shows, which was their idea of heaven.

Jimmy's favorite actor was George M. Cohan. Sitting in the gallery, watching this great showman, Jimmy even in his wildest dreams would never have believed that some day he would portray this great man on the screen to the tune of twelve thousand, five hundred dollars a week.

Recently a close friend of the late star told the Cagneys an incident which was a great tribute to Jimmy.

Shortly after "Yankee Doodle Dandy" was released, George wanted his wife, who has been an invalid for years, to see it. So it was arranged for the picture to be shown at the Cohan home. During the picture Mrs. Cohan was silent, but when it was finished, she got out of her wheel chair and slowly (Continued on page 85)

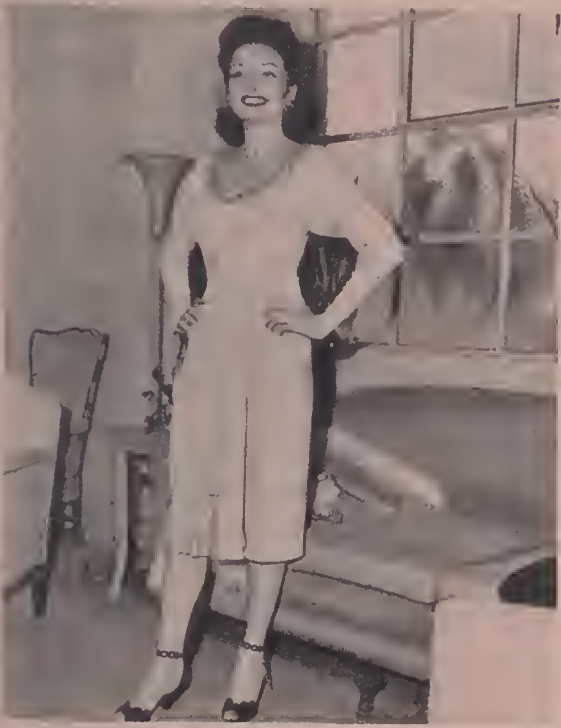
of the Month



The bride! Lynn Bari, Twentieth Century-Fox actress, poses for a full-length view of her beige crepe wedding gown. See how the matching souffle neckline is edged with a design of French gold beads? The cardigan sleeves came to a point over each hand, and a front drape lends grace to the form-fitting line.

Their wedding kiss! The bridegroom, Sid Luft, is a test pilot. The bride, who wore a brown velvet halo-hat with her beige wedding costume, carried a bouquet of Talisman roses and white camellias. After the ceremony was over, she wore a corsage of green orchids, also given to her by the adoring benedict. Wedding ceremony and reception took place at the Bel Air home of the William Perlbergs. (Twentieth Century-Fox producer, Mr. Perlberg.) By the way, this was a second wedding for Lynn. She was once married and divorced from agent Walter Kane.

"With this ring I thee wed"—and the knot was tied! The marriage rites were read by Judge Edward Brand (brother of Harry Brand, the studio publicity head), before an improvised altar decorated with bouquets of dusty pink chrysanthemums. Lynn's bracelet is a gift from the bridegroom. It's gold mesh, set with rubies and diamonds.

Here Movieland's editor calls on designer Howard Greer so that she can see the last fitting of Lynn's wedding dress, the fashion note of this wedding of the month. For "something borrowed" the bride wore a blue garter contributed by "Cookie" (Mrs. Mack) Gordon; her "something old", a handkerchief Sid had given her for her birthday.

Red Skelton doesn't believe colors influence his luck. But you always find a dash of maroon on him. So where there's Red, there's maroon!

Dorothy Lamour has never been known to cross to the other side of the street to avoid having a black cat cross her path. Black cats never bring her bad luck. Nor walking under ladders. She goes looking for ladders to walk under.

Van Johnson always shines silver before eating, even when dining at friends' homes. He says he likes to see Lady Luck shine right back at him.

ALICE FAYE doesn't believe in retracing one single step. She never goes back to put the cat out, to bring the dog in, to turn the radio off or make certain her last smoldering cigarette has been extinguished.

Kay Francis absolutely refuses to wear orchids. Even Walter Winchell couldn't pin one on her. "Of course, they are an exquisite flower," says Kay blithely, "but let the other girls wear them—they don't bring me luck."

Maureen O'Hara has a date once a month with—guess who? The new moon, no less. She closes her eyes, bows to the moon, turns around three times and crosses her palm with silver. Do you wonder if it's an Irish custom? No, it's Maureen's. After she has performed this little ritual, she believes Dame Fortune will graciously smile upon her. With that new baby on the way she's now doing this more faithfully than ever.

Virginia Bruce will walk a mile—no, not for a Camel—but to make a wish on a white horse. This is a heck of a habit to have in Hollywood where a horse of any color is a darned rare sight. Virginia sometimes goes months without a chance at a single wish.

LUM AND ABNER NEED

The Young Men Who Play Oldsters on Screen and Radio Will

What do you think of Abner (Norris Goff) as a great new screen lover? Posed with him here is Barbara Hale, the love interest opposite Frank Sinatra in the RKO musical, "Higher and Higher."

Lum (Chester Lauck) seems to be doing all right, too! Barbara thinks he would make a top leading man. Dramatically romantic, or the old man with white wig and whiskers—which will it be?

WHEN you're perplexed about something, ask folks to help you. Ask advice. That's what Chet Lauck and Norris Goff would tell you. That's their philosophy, and the philosophy of their famous screen and radio characters, Lum and Abner, as well.

Now Lauck and Goff are perplexed, and they're turning to you Movieland readers for the solution to their problems.

They want to find out whether their movie audience, which probably includes a big slice of their giant radio audience, as well, would like to see them on the screen as young men.

You see, sans those white wigs and whiskers, bleached brows and artificial wrinkles they wore in "So This Is Washington" and other pictures, the boys are pretty sharp. More than a bit on the leading man type. They're quite the boys around Hollywood town.

It took the movies years to talk the boys, already famous on radio, into making a picture. Their first clicked, and then they made another. It was called "The Bashful Bachelor." That was even more successful, particularly in the smaller towns and rural districts, where Lum and Abner are top favorites on the air.

But it remained for their latest picture, "So This Is Washington," to hit the big cities between the eyes. Still, it followed a formula. It carried on the radio characters, white whiskers and all. The boys thought they ought to keep these characters intact, with their Arkansas dialect and background at least included in the movies, along with familiar sets such as the Jot 'Em Down Store.

Now they're just about talked into appearing on the screen as themselves, either in or out of their familiar Lum and Abner pictures.

They want the advice of their screen and radio fans about this vitally important step in their careers.

What do you think? Should they start a new series of films having nothing to do with the Lum and Abner pictures, radio shows, characters or locale, in each of which they would play different characters, just as do Messrs. Grant, Cagney, Cooper, etc.?

Or should they just stay themselves?

Each method, from the boys' point of view, has good points and bad. That's why they're perplexed. And that's why they are asking you for advice through Movieland.

To make it interesting, the stars, the companies producing and releasing their pictures, and this magazine, have planned to ask for this advice in a contest.

YOUR HELP!

Pay You Money For Your Advice

Norris Goff (top) plays checkers with Abner, while Chester Lauck engages his old friend Lum. Actually, of course, it's a trick of the cameraman.

For prizes, to make the contest still more interesting, $2,000 in War Bonds will be given to the winners, with the first prize a $1000 Bond. There will be five $100 Bond prizes and ten $50 Bond prizes.

These lush rewards are offered for the best letters of advice, not longer than 250 words each, telling Lum and Abner—Chet Lauck and Norris Goff—what you would like them to do in this predicament.

Prizes will be awarded on the basis of the soundness of the advice, rather than on the literary quality of the letters.

The letters should be addressed to the Lum and Abner Contest Editor, Movieland, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles, 46, California.

The contest closes April 1, 1944. No letters postmarked after midnight of that date can be judged.

Meanwhile, the boys will await your response to their plea. Of course, their radio shows will be going on right along, five per week, Monday through Friday, over the Blue Network. And they may film a Lum and Abner picture.

But they'll wait for the advice of their friends before they bow to producer pressure to step before the cameras as their youthful selves. They want to hear what you have to say about it.

"Something on the black lace side" was the request made by a group of submariners in the Pacific, and Rita sent this photo.

Big thrill! The USO conducts regular weekly tours around the Hollywood lots. Sometimes the uniformed visitors are lucky and catch a star when she has time to show them some real fun and entertainment.

HEROES, HAYWORTH AND LONELY HEARTS

What's a Pin-Up girl? She's the symbol of home, the picture a fighting man writes to, his dream of love and glamour—Rita Hayworth

By DOROTHY DEERE

The letter read:

"Dear Rita:

"This is not a fan letter, but rather a supplication from a couple of white men out here in the Far East. We're an outfit of submariners who've been in these parts ever since the start of the trouble with our little brown friends. It's all been very interesting and you might say exciting, but we do get tired of nothing but salt water with only an occasional week in port for a sack of peanuts and a short beer.

"In other words, we're growing tired of our own company and muchly desiring a change of scenery. We've already taken a step in the right direction by giving that picture of you in your night-shirt (the one that ran in a fan mag some time ago) a prominent location in our boudoir. However, as time passes, this photo, luscious as it is, is growing dull and faded as battery fumes and depth charges do their damnedest. We therefore request, with all respect, that you forward us something with a dash of color in it—say on the black lace side—that may effectively resist the wear and tear of war conditions.

"Rest assured that the photo, if sent, will be placed over the mantel with the 'God Bless Our Home' sampler—which should show you that we're really a bunch of very sentimental guys, and that picture will do more good than you could even guess.

"It's going to be a long time before we get back to the good ol' U.S.A. and find ourselves marching in that Victory Parade up Market Street in San Francisco. Until that time, keep the folks busy back there—and thanks in advance for that black lace job we asked for.

Sincerely,
Lieut. ———, J. G.

How does it feel to get some nine thousand letters from service men a month—month after month—every one of them suggesting, pleading or just plain demanding that you send them an autographed picture?

What would it do to you to know that all over this gun-torn world—in muddy fox-holes, in bullet-pierced

What, and she can cook, too? One Spanish omelette, coming up! It's this sort of thing that makes several million service men think the American way of life is well worth their fighting for.

cockpits, in fever-ridden jungle hospitals, in sweltering ships' boiler rooms—your likeness is pinned or pasted, or carried in the pockets of men you've never met, whose names you couldn't even begin to remember?

The term "Pin-Up Girl," like the words "jeep," "G-I haircut," "blackout," "4-F" and other current Americana, was born of practical usage and straightaway went whimsical. It has done wonders for the radio gangsters' vocabulary, and given the movie press agent a new lease on news space. Outside of that, it hasn't earned much respect on the home front.

A "Pin-Up Girl," as far as the general public is concerned, is a glamour gal who poses with as little between her and the camera as the Hays office will allow, and then sends out the picture to any soldier, sailor or marine who asks for it. The more curves she can pitch in one posing, the more of them are going to ask for it.

To the men in training or on the battlefronts, the "Pin-Up Girl" is something else again. The very process now dragging civilization downward has raised her to something akin to a symbol. She is glorified sex and allure, for these are the things Hollywood has always stood for. But to understand how much more she has suddenly become—confidant, talisman, dream-girl in the dreamland of fun and peace and plenty they once called home—you'd have to read the thousands and thousands of letters she receives.

Rita Hayworth, the lovely, leggy Latin who, along with Betty Grable, Lana Turner and Hedy Lamarr tops the list of favorites, says this "Pin-Up" business is something you can't explain in one sentence.

"It's flattering—and it's frightening.

"Practically every feminine star's mail has been increased by the war. We get great stacks of letters declaring us the favorite of this troop and the sweetheart of that one, and it's a great improvement on ordinary fan mail. Instead of a solitary fan letter, we're getting adulation on the wholesale plan.

"You hear you've been voted 'The Girl We'd Rather Whistle At in the Southwest Pacific Area,' or maybe 'The Girl We'd Rather Share a Life Raft With,' and you thank heaven for the good old unsinkable American sense of humor. Those are the letters you turn over to the publicity department—because, after all, that's part of being an actress.

"Then, there are the other kind—"

A couple of cartons of the "other" kind of letters sit in the corner of Rita's private dressing suite on the Columbia lot. The suite, as you might expect, is ex-

Posing for camera fans in the Columbia still gallery. A lot of fighters appreciate the opportunity of taking their own Pin-Up pictures, and Rita is the gal who will never refuse a sitting.

Rita, the "sew up girl" at Camp Callon. Says a sailor in a Maryland boot camp, "Say, aren't you forgetting the Navy?"

pensively movietown, jewelled with mirrored dressing tables, lush with white carpeting and flower-splashed drapery, such utilitarian objects as telephone and electric fan glamourized with a pale peach make up.

The one inescapable note of reality in the whole setup is those cartons, their dull sides bellying with the load of stacked letters. Postmarked from places the average American never heard of until a year ago, they were written by men who haven't had their feet on a carpet or leaned their heads against the upholstered back of a divan for many weary months. Men up to their ears in the grim business of war, and while they wait to kill or be killed, hungering for the softness and comfort they used to think were standard equipment for living.

A "Pin-Up Girl" can't escape that hunger written into and between the lines. To her, who is part real and part dream, the writer sets down all the things he keeps out of the letters written home.

Rita wafts one of her long-fingered hands toward a carton and picks a letter off the top. It turns out to be from a member of the Signal Photographic Corps newly moved from the Pacific to the "desolate forests of Australia," and it might be the inner voice of any soldier, anywhere. It reads, in part:

"—and it wasn't any picnic. I've seen enough filth, ruin, gore and suffering to last me a life-time. One thing I'm going to do when I get back is live—and you'd be surprised to know the little things that now make up my definition of Life—a piece of good steak, a clean bed, a drink of cold water with no chlorine or iodine in it.

"It's very funny, how many things we all take for granted until they take them away from us—the little things of personal comfort, the love and sweetness, the companionship of peaceful people, the personal touches that used to make our much too ordinary day differ just slightly from that of the mug across the street, or the newsboy on the corner.

"All those things seem to me now as if they only took place in a wonderful dream I once had, and every night I try to recapture some of it so the next day will be a little more bearable. Damn it, Rita, I'm homesick—and it makes me sound like a sissy, which doesn't matter, because after all you don't even know me.

"You see, even in these far off spots Hollywood still holds on to its enchantment. I started out writing just to ask you for a picture of yourself. Somehow I feel it would help me to remember a lot of things pretty hazy to me now—the movies and other fun, the happiness and beauty that are (Continued on page 68)

Livvy adores older men. That must include Charles Coburn, who's shown with her here in a scene from "Princess O'Rourke," recent Warner Bros. release.

Look at this! Major Woodward Malone on a dancing date with Olivia. She's attracted by men with brains, humor and courage. Could it be that here's one who qualifies?

She's always been in love, ever since she was five years old. Olivia, the romantic gal with "three A" ambitions

MY FIRST GREAT ADVENTURE . . .

Occurred when I was five. We lived opposite a school, an old wooden building that had been declared derelict. The children in the neighborhood plugged the plumbing and flooded the boys' half of the basement so that water stood three feet deep.

We made rafts of boxes that were lying around, and had a glorious time poling around the basement on them.

I still feel the thrill of my tremendous excitement.

I REMEMBER . . .

A little boy named Abner Read, in the third grade when I was in first grade. He wore an orange and black sweater which he hung up in the cloak room. I used to come to school late so that I could kiss it surreptitiously as I passed.

I FORGET . . .

When I ceased to care for Abner, but I was always in love. When I was six I admired another boy who threw a rock at me. Ten years later, when I was sixteen, he proposed.

I USED TO . . .

all my ambitions beginning with "a". It seemed a significant coincidence.

See myself as a heroine. I saw myself saving lives by the dozen. When the Los Gatos Creek flooded the prune trees, which it did regularly every year, I saw myself rescuing people with the Australian crawl. . . . I still can't swim more than fifteen consecutive strokes!

See myself in various roles and then act out the roles. I went to a convent where the slightest deviation from conventional behavior was punished. I was distinctly feminine, but I saw myself then as a tomboy and proceeded to behave like one. Very trying for my family but I suppose I enjoyed it at the time.

CHECKING UP ON JAMES CRAIG

JAMES CRAIG'S acting career is astronomical at the moment, literally and figuratively. But his feet, and his hands as well, are really stuck in good old terra firma.

It's like this. On the set of "The Heavenly Body," during the shooting of that sophisticated comedy in which scientific astronomy gets all mixed up with pseudo-science astrology, they had an expression for Jimmy's activities: "From Hedy to horses to cement."

For as soon as James Craig finished his stint before the camera, making love to Hedy Lamarr, he doffed his actor's clothes, donned his dungarees, hopped on his motorcycle and dashed back to his farm.

Properly, in California, you should say "ranch." But Jim insists his place isn't big enough to live up to that tremendous name.

"We were building the brooder house and feed room at the time," Jimmy said. "There was cement to mix and the foundation to lay. With hundreds of chickens awaiting a roof over their heads, making love to Hedy couldn't be allowed to interfere." His dark brown eyes flashed and laugh lines sprouted deep at the corners of his mouth as he said that.

The remark explains a lot about Jim Craig. He is a rugged stalwart in a gentlemanly mold. He is not afraid of hard work. On the contrary, he thrives on it, whether it is strenuous physical labor or acting before the camera.

"In a year and a half, I haven't even taken one Sunday off," he says, proud of his vitality.

No Hollywood actor has made greater strides in the past year than James Craig. Ever since his vivid portrayal of the student doctor in "Kitty Foyle," each of his pictures has been a stepping stone to greater popularity, and including every kind of acting from roles in such cowboy sagas as "Northwest Rangers," to serious drama in "The Human Comedy," to broad comedy in "Swing Shift Maisie." He's made seven pictures in the past year, which is a record for a leading man.

"I want to be able to play any kind of a role and I'll do whatever I have to do to learn. Acting is like a trade," he says. "A carpenter, for instance, knows what tools he has, but he must also know how to use them."

It was gas rationing that made it necessary for the Jimmy Craigs to rent this Beverly Hills home. They much prefer ranch living.

Jim and his beautiful wife, Mary, live a gaily quiet home life, independent of the Hollywood social whirl.

The Craig "men" get together. They're great pals, the trio you see here—including Duke, the cocker spaniel.

He thinks naturally in terms of carpentering. One of the first jobs he ever had was that of carpenter's helper at the Dupont plant at Old Hickory, Tennessee, during summer vacations.

In high school and college he became an outstanding athlete in football and track, and for a time when school days were over he played professional football. That football physique, six feet, two and a half inches, and one hundred ninety pounds, gives him a niche among the biggest leading men in motion pictures.

From the time Jimmy had his first paper route, while in knee pants in his native Nashville, right up 'til now, his ambition for financial independence has been a driving force within him.

At various times he was on the verge of a career in medicine, professional football, boxing and oil promotion. But none of those gave him the opportunity to get ahead fast enough.

James Craig is not one to wait for opportunity to knock. He goes out and makes it thump. That's how he became an actor.

He was doing very well for himself in sales promotion with General Motors in Houston, Texas, after he had graduated from Rice Institute. By most young men's standards, he was well on his way. He had a good salary, his own apartment and a car.

However, on his first vacation he drove to California. He visited Hollywood, and once in a while he caught a glimpse of a celebrity sans makeup. He thought of all that beautiful movie money.

"Why stars are just people like the rest of us," he analyzed. "Only, they know how to act. Why can't you learn to act just as you learn anything else?"

Jimmy had no contacts in Hollywood. However, he had faith in his own salesmanship. One of his tenets of selling had always been to go to the top, to see the head man. He used the same technique to launch himself into pictures.

James Henry Meador, salesman from Houston, had never been on a stage, had never had a dramatic lesson in his life. But he calmly called M-G-M and asked for the drama coach. He was connected with Oliver Hinsdale and before he had hung up, Jimmy had been invited to the studio next day for an interview.

"I sold myself to Hinsdale, all right," Jimmy relates. "'Go home and get a good diction coach,' Hinsdale told me. 'Try to do some Little Theater work and come back next year.'"

That's exactly what he did.

The following summer when Jimmy returned to Hollywood, he located Oliver Hinsdale at Paramount now, instead of M-G-M, and again was asked to come to the studio. This time, he impressed Hinsdale with what he had learned about acting. He was soon signed to a contract, and his name was changed to James Craig.

Having come from Texas with a drawl half acquired from his native Tennessee, half from his sojourn in the Lone Star State, the studio powers-that-be identified him with the wide open spaces and Jimmy found himself assigned to horse operas.

Jim loves horses. He has ridden since he was a stripling on his grandfather's farm, but he certainly didn't want to tie his motion picture future to westerns.

In vain he sought roles without boots and spurs. "You have no real dramatic experience," the studio argued, and kept him in the saddle.

"I figured the New York stage was the best place to get dramatic experience," Jimmy said, "so I headed for New York."

THE BOYS YOU MISS IN PICTURES ARE IN THE NEW ARMY SHOW

"WINGED VICTORY," the New York stage hit, is paying off with big dividends as a cash collecting benefit for Army Emergency Relief. At a request from General Arnold, funds from the show go for medical assistance to families of soldiers.

It's another "This Is the Army" deal. In the cast you will find some of the boys you have been missing in pictures—hit players in the show, many of whom have been commandeered for the Hollywood screen version now in production on the 20th Century-Fox lot. (Incidentally, of the three hundred men in the troupe, none has been called from combat duty.)

Moss Hart, who authored and directed, has heretofore rejected every offer that Hollywood has made. Now, however, he is doing "Winged Victory" for free, helping to make the movie version.

BATTLE OF THE BEST SELLERS

Katharine Hepburn read a story, liked it—result, "Woman of the Year," and an Oscar for the authors.

Your reporter, William Dozier, head of the Story Department for Paramount—collector of stories about stories.

James Hilton, author turned script writer. Except for him, there might have been no "Mrs. Miniver."

by WILLIAM DOZIER

THERE aren't a half dozen stars in Hollywood today who even pretend to perpetuate the myth that film stars pick their own stories. But behind the stars as you see them on the screen the battle of the sellers rages.

Once in a great while, in the case of an original story tailored by a Hollywood writer for some particular player, the star is the first to learn of the story and bring it to his studio's attention. Such was the case with "Mr. Lucky," Cary Grant's last for RKO. Milton Holmes, tennis playing friend of Cary, knocked out his first original story and pointed it for Grant. Cary read it . . . recognized the potentialities as a vehicle for himself, waltzed into head man Charlie Koerner's office, and a few hours later RKO had traded Holmes thirty-five thousand dollars for his yarn. It was then titled "Bundles For Freedom" and later appeared under that title in a national magazine.

Then there was also the time Katharine Hepburn, while dating director Garson Kanin, heard of a story Gar's brother, Michael, was at work on in collaboration with Ring Lardner, Jr. Katie read it, rushed over to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and said if they would give her Spencer Tracy for her leading man and buy this script (for a chilled one hundred thousand dollars, by the way) she would make the picture for them. Result—"Woman of the Year," an Academy nomination for Katie and an Oscar for Kanin and Lardner for the year's best original screenplay.

But those are exceptions, and most of Hollywood's top pictures come from best-selling novels and successful Broadway plays; but since there are about three thousand books published yearly compared to about two hundred plays produced on Broadway, the minority naturally must come from the former source. And the stars are usually the last to know of these stories.

How does a story ever get to the attention of a producer and then to a star? This is how. Each of the seven major companies and several independent producers maintain an extensive story department not only in their West Coast studios but also in their New York offices. These staffs are constantly combing the book publishing market, and secure access to forthcoming novels many months before they appear between covers in the book shops. The picture possibilities of these embryonic best sellers are appraised by trained editors, by skilled producers, and shrewd executives. Nine times out of ten, the movie rights are bought by some studio long before the general public . . . and the stars . . . are aware of the book's existence. "Gone With The Wind," "How Green Was My Valley," "King's Row," "Random Harvest," "Pied Piper," "Frenchman's Creek," "Saratoga Trunk," "The Hour Before the Dawn," "Drivin' Woman," "The Human Comedy," and countless other important novels which have become, or are soon to become, front rank pictures, were bought by studios either from the author's manuscripts or publishers' galley-proofs, in all cases at least six months before publication of the books themselves.

When Elizabeth Chevalier had completed only a sixty-page outline of "Drivin' Woman," her agent took it to MGM, who in turn gambled on its prospects for best sellerdom, planked down seventy-five thousand dollars then and there, and sat back smilingly to watch the book jump to the top of the best seller list eight months later. They didn't know then what new star would be born, or what established star made to shine brighter, by playing this adventurous heroine. Now they have finally decided the star shall be Greer Garson. Likewise did MGM buy "Random Harvest" three weeks after James Hilton had finished the manuscript, and "The Human Comedy" before Saroyan himself had decided whether or not to have it published in book form. And neither Greer Garson nor Ronald Colman nor Mickey Rooney nor adorable little Jackie Jenkins had any idea of what was going on in those directions at the time.

When Paramount bought "For Whom the Bell Tolls," in this case about two weeks after publication, they had no idea who would play Roberto or Maria. Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman had been mentioned, yes, but Paramount had no contract with either at the time and no assurance they could ever get these two stars for the production. Indeed, when the studio prepared to produce the picture, it was first planned to use Vera Zorina as Maria and Stirling Hayden, its rising star, as Roberto. Stirling joined the war effort, Zorina tested for Maria . . . but finally, as the world now knows, Cooper and Bergman played the roles.

When Warner Bros. snatched Edna Ferber's "Saratoga Trunk" from the other companies (and for one hundred and seventy-five thousand) nine months before its publication, they certainly had no idea the same Gary and Ingrid would wind up in the top parts. And neither did Gary and Ingrid. Many months later, after the two had worked so successfully and harmoniously with director Sam Wood in "For Whom the Bell Tolls," all three decided to move over to Warners' and do another picture together.

When I sat at the Academy Banquet last February and watched Greer Garson accept the richly deserved Oscar for her performance as Mrs. Miniver, I couldn't help thinking of the circumstances which brought this story to the screen, and eventually the statuette to Miss Garson.

Jan Struther's little book was at the top of the national best seller list—yet every studio had passed it by. "No story," they said, or "too precious, we're afraid." But one day the author's agent, who was also James Hilton's agent, asked Hilton to read the book. He did.

"Do you think you could get a movie story out of it, Jimmy?" asked the agent. The author of "Goodbye Mr. Chips" said he was pretty sure he could. So over to the studio went the two. They lunched with producer-director Sidney Franklin and story editor Kenneth MacKenna (now Capt. MacKenna of the U. S. Army).

Next day MGM took an option on the book, James Hilton was hired to adapt it, three other writers were later called in to help, and finally from all that grist emerged Greer Garson playing the title role in the acknowledged best picture of the year. Jan Struther is now in Hollywood. Not long ago, I saw her again at a cocktail party. Jimmy Hilton was there also, and we enjoyed reminiscing along the above lines. You see, I was the agent, but that is unimportant.

Two years before, Ginger Rogers nabbed the Academy Award, and justifiably so, for (Continued on page 73)

THIS YEAR OF GRACE
for Joan Crawford

1944 offers Joan Crawford, born on March 23rd, under the sign Aries, many opportunities to reach the greatest heights of her dramatic career, if she has learned to control a fiery disposition and lay temperament aside.

For Saturn and Uranus transit her seventh House. They twine her Natal Moon, Saturn and Mars, and oppose her natal Uranus. This dynamic combination holds better understanding of people and affairs. It gives her caution and control of her own impulses.

Her natal Sun, in Aries at birth, opposed Mars, her ruling planet, and also squared Neptune. Therefore she has an impulsive nature, is open to jealousy and deception. but has the courage to fight against all odds.

She should remember that hasty action, especially in speculation of any nature, has made many past difficulties. This applies alike to home and career. Any home problems should be settled by July.

She should control over-optimism. Desires with high motives will be realized, provided she does not drive herself—and others—to the point of exhaustion in her determination for perfection.

Even hard won rewards are hard to keep. So it is that as the Sun, Venus, Mercury and the Moon trace their paths across her chart this year, they bring their share of problems and joys. Nothing should tempt her from the path she is now traveling. If she accepts the freedoms and restraints with tact and wisdom, the year's end should find her one of the screen's immortals.

For all persons born between March 21 and April 20

Early in its stride the year brings some recognition of apparently unrewarded struggles. Many who seemed to turn from you will now return for help and offer help. Business and social affairs will improve, since you have far too much pride to accept help without giving it.

Persons born under Aries have difficulty in understanding and cooperating with those with whom they are in partnership, especially during April and May. It is part of your cosmic task to recognize your partners' importance and your need of them. You can be wrong, so walk softly and with caution.

Be very sure of any investment, whether in finances or love. Caution is not your metier, but you must use it all the time. Romance beckons, but be sure of your decisions, and if you are already married and the year demands much of your partner, be thankful he or she is having the chance of fulfillment. Avoid resentment.

Forgive the infidelities of friends, but don't forget them. Strive to stay beyond any pettiness and impatience. It is a year packed full of dynamite, so handle it with care, and the results will exceed your ambitions—which are limitless.

THEIR FIRST LOVE

Barbara Stanwyck: "He didn't think much of my face."

BARBARA STANWYCK was fourteen years old when she met her dream man. "I was standing backstage in a New York theater," she recalls, "watching a vaudeville act in which a family friend was appearing. Standing in the wings, I was very much impressed by this glimpse of a world which seemed very glamorous to me. Then I saw the most marvelous looking man I had ever beheld. He had also stepped into the wings of the theatre. He was tall and dark haired, and had a moustache. His hair had a glint which probably came from vaseline. He was undoubtedly a typical vaudevillian, but he was my ideal of everything a man should be. I lost my heart to him immediately, and decided that this was a definite case of 'Who ever loved that loved not at first sight'?

"I swished past my dream man in the hope of attracting his attention. I succeeded. He turned to a man standing near him, and said in a whisper loud, 'Look at that petite enfant. Hasn't she the funniest face we've ever had backstage?'

"I was so hurt that I vowed I'd never fall in love again. Of course, I didn't know then that one wonderful day I was going to meet a guy called Robert Taylor."

Irene Dunne: "I ignored him."

IRENE DUNNE says, "When I was sixteen, there came to Louisville, Kentucky, one of the handsomest boys we'd ever seen in town. His name was Walter, and all the girls were crazy about him. Besides being handsome, he was so sophisticated. He treated us all like country cousins and we loved it. I lost my heart to him completely, though I pretended I loathed him.

"One day I was invited to a party at which I knew Walter would also be present. I laid my campaign plans very carefully. I knew that every girl at the party would set her cap for Walter; that they would all be chasing him. I made up my mind that I would be the only girl at the party to ignore Walter. I reasoned that a young man pursued by so many women might be intrigued by the one girl who didn't pursue him.

"My campaign worked. Walter evidently couldn't understand why I ignored him so completely; and from that time on, he began pursuing me. What would have happened if he hadn't moved out of town, I can't imagine."

ALL the Sullivans were sitting there on the platform in the shipyard, Mom and Pa and Gen. Funny to think of the three of them as all the Sullivans, but that's how it was now—just them and that ship waiting to ride down the ways, the ship with SULLIVAN painted across its prow.

Mom was wearing a new hat and an orchid corsage. A short time ago she wouldn't have known an orchid from an iris, but things were different now. She'd got so she knew a lot she never had before, travelling all over the country the way she and Pa had, seeing the big cities, New York and Chicago and now San Francisco. They certainly had done a lot of running around for a couple of homebodies. At their time of life, too.

Yet Mom wore her years surprisingly well, considering everything. Of course they'd taken away the prettiness she had when she was a girl, and they'd thickened her waist and padded her bosom and left lines on her face. But the years had enriched her, too. She'd borne six kids and she'd had the love of a good man for thirty years and she'd always had young people around to keep her

The Sullivan boys had always wanted a boat of their own. What did it matter that this one was full of holes? They caulked the holes with dried mud and set sail. Ship ahoy!

Sequel to the ill-fated first voyage. It was a long swim to shore, and little Al almost didn't make it. It's things like this a mother remembers, when her boys have grown up.

These were the happiest years for the Sullivan family. Oh, the kids got into trouble now and then, and Pa scolded them. There was never much money, still Ma always managed somehow. The thing was, you see, the Sullivans always stuck together.

The SULLIVANS

CONTINUED

Thirty-three years Pa had been with the railroad, and never once late. Still had a lot of vigor left in him, too. He was always a good father to his family, and a good husband.

It was the day George won the motorcycle race. Frank and Matt rushed right out to congratulate him, but they weren't a bit more thrilled than all the rest of the family—including Gen!

forgetting she wasn't as young as she used to be.

Pa had a lot of vigor left in him, too. He was the sort of man who'd never dodder, who could never be called a poor, sweet old man, no matter what happened to him. He had taken care of himself in roundhouse fights when he was a young fella, and he could still stand up against any blows life dealt him.

Mom sat up just as straight as she could when the Admiral began making his speech. She didn't want to miss a word of it. Remembering things afterward was so important. She'd found that out.

"We are here today," he began, "for the christening and launching of a new ship of the United States Navy. She is to be named for five ordinary seamen, five American boys who enlisted together to fight for our country."

Mom heard Gen trying to stifle a sniffle. Things were harder for those who hadn't lived long enough to get a good grip on life. Poor Gen didn't have so many years of lusty living behind her when the blow fell as Mom and Pa had. Mom leaned over and patted her daughter's hand, but her eyes kept looking at the Admiral.

"It was by their own special request to the Navy that they sailed together on the same ship, the cruiser Juneau," he was saying. "They knew the risk they ran, the danger that if one were lost, all might be lost. But they had grown up together, back in Waterloo, Iowa, and when the time came they were resolved to fight together, too."

The brand new hat perched on Mom's head nodded in vigorous accord. They'd always been like that, the boys—ever since they were barely able to toddle, ganging up together when anyone of them had a fight on his hands. Not that they didn't fight with each other, too. They wouldn't have been the Sullivans if they hadn't. But Mom had always let them finish it when they did fight. She wasn't one for coddling or protecting any of them. She remembered how there was always a bottle of arnica in the house those days, and there was hardly a day one of them didn't have a black eye. Black eyes and arnica—funny the way they spelled the happiest years in Mom's life. Years with the house full of growing kids sliding down banisters and tracking up the kitchen with muddy feet and . . . goodness, she could go on forever thinking of all the things they used to do. Now she had to listen to the Admiral.

"They were brothers. The Juneau's register carried their family name five times." And as the Admiral repeated the name Sullivan five times, his voice made a proud thing of it. "A world at war should know the story of the Sullivan family. Their life was a constant struggle against poverty. There were six children to feed and clothe, house and educate on the wages of a railway freight conductor. Yet the Sullivans so lived in their family, and in this country, that Death itself could not defeat them. There was . . ."

He was repeating their names now in order of their ages, but Mom didn't have to listen to that. They were written in her heart. George, first, he was the oldest. Then Francis and Joseph and Madison and Albert. One after the other she had held them in her arms, such funny little wrinkled-faced babies. And of course there was Gen, too, who had come between Francis and Joseph.

The Admiral was right. There never had been much money, and no one knew as well as Mom how hard it was to stretch Pa's pay to take care of all of them. But they'd always been able to laugh. Nothing was ever so hard that they weren't able to laugh.

Like that time Pa told the boys there was trout in Miller's pond and casually suggested the best bait was the worms found under grapevines.

"Rain runnin' offa grapevines soaks into the dirt, see, an' gets a special kind of worm food in it," Pa said—and there wasn't even a twinkle in his eyes. "But you don't wanna hurt the roots of the vine when you dig for them, though. If them roots bleed, see, it poisons the worms."

How the boys had dug under Pa's cherished grapevines that day! Pa had been pretty busy and the weeds had got a strong hold around them, but when the boys got finished digging and pulling up it looked as if a professional gardener had been at work—and the grapes were the best that year they'd ever been.

But the fishing wasn't. All the kids came home with was one scrawny little thing hardly bigger than a minnow.

"Pa," George called as they came up the path. "There wasn't no trout in . . ."

But Pa was laughing so he didn't finish the sentence.

"Trout's hard to catch," Pa guffawed. "But you can always catch suckers."

It didn't seem long ago, remembering. It could have been yesterday they brought home that dog given them by the man who lived down near the dump. And pretty glad the man was to be rid of him, too, Mom decided, judging from the way the critter ate and tore around the house and dirtied up the big wash she'd just finished. They called him Chief and they were terribly proud of him.

"A real, genuwine Mongrel hound," that's what the man had told them he was and that's what the boys called him, too. They got in a fight with the kids who lived in the next district when they jeered at Chief, saying there was no such thing as a Mongrel hound, and who'd want a mangy old flea-bitten mutt from the dumps anyway.

"Why don't your mother cut him up for stew?" one of them had sneered. And that had been just too much for the Sullivans.

"Okay," George had said, rolling up his sleeves. "Here we go." And they lit into the gang.

It was right outside of the church, too. The four oldest had been to Confession. Al was still in there with the priest and the others were waiting for him. But by the time he was through the fight was still going on in full force, and Al forgot he was wearing his new First Communion suit and lit right in with the others.

They were a sight when they came home, and Mom sent them right back to the priest to make their confessions all over again. Father Francis understood boys, though, and his eyes twinkled as he gave them penance. But the new suit had been torn beyond patching. And so there Al went through Communion the next day in in his corduroy everyday clothes, and the shiner closing one eye was a beauty. But he was wearing his flowing white satin bow on one arm with the best of them.

It was after that Pa decided the boys would have to get rid of Chief. He was eating more than any one of them and it was hard enough having eight mouths to feed, without that dog, who never seemed to get his fill. The boys took it hard, but they knew once Pa had made up his mind it was useless to argue or try to wheedle him.

They picked out a nice comfortable farm first, where it looked as if food, even for a dog, would be no problem. Then, luring Chief into the barn, they shut the door on him, praying the farmer would be good to him when he found him. But they'd no sooner got home than they heard an eager yelp at the back door—and there was Chief, panting with eagerness and exertion, closing his eyes in ecstasy as he lifted one paw in frantic greeting.

After that the least they could do was to give him one heck of a time before they tried losing him again. They went down to the lake to swim and then, oh wonder of wonders, they found the abandoned row boat. It was full of holes, but it was a boat. And the Sullivan boys had always wanted a boat of their own.

It was when they decided to christen her, the boat capsized and they all struck out for shore. It wasn't until the others reached the bank that they saw Al was having trouble. They were so far away they'd never be able to get to him in time. And then they saw Chief, paddling frantically towards Al. Grabbing the strap of his overalls, the dog towed him to shore. They'd heard of dogs doing things like that, but they'd never seen it happen before. Gosh, how they loved Chief then, a million, million times more than they even had before.

Pa didn't say much when they told him. Only his eyes looked kind of shiny. And after dinner they saw him give Chief the beef bone with almost enough meat left on it to do for stew the next day.

"Well, he was a good fella," Pa said, patting his head. "Good dog."

The boys knew everything was okay then.

They should never have taken Bill Bascom hunting with them that autumn. Bill had big ideas. He wasn't content with trying to flush rabbits or pheasants. A deer, that's what he wanted, he said, going further into the woods.

He hadn't been gone long when they missed Chief. At first they were sure he'd gone home, for he hadn't enjoyed the hunting. He'd cringed every time a gun went off. Then they heard a shot, followed by a frenzied yelp. The boys knew then even before they found Chief. What made it even worse was that there wasn't anything they could do for him.

"What'll we do with him?" Matt gulped. "Should we bury him here?"

"No," George said, his voice sounding prickly and hard. "Home. In the yard."

"Yeah." Joe nodded. "He liked the yard."

"Yeah," Frank said. "He sure liked the yard."

So there was the cross made of box slats nailed together, with Chief's name painted on it, and they gave him a funeral with flowers and hymns and a prayer and everything. And it was a long, long time before anyone dared to speak his name again.

It was right after the funeral the town saw the five Sullivans marching steadily along the street, looking neither to left nor right. It was their fighting walk and the other kids got out of their way. But the Sullivans didn't stop until they reached the Bascom house.

"Say, what's eating you?" Pa sounded so helpless whenever Mom cried. Maybe it was because she did it so seldom. "No sense turning on the waterworks, just because Al's gone daffy over some girl. Why, he wouldn't be a legal Sullivan if he didn't!"

"We want to see Bill," George said when Mrs. Bascom answered the bell.

"Billy's not feeling well," she said. "Maybe it'll cheer him up to see you. He's been crying all afternoon. He killed a dog. He feels just awful about it."

They looked at each other, their faces still stoney. They went upstairs and Bill's strangled sobs came out to them from behind the closed door. They didn't even knock but went right in.

Bill looked up at them, his face all red and splotched with tears. He didn't try to get away, just looked at them, waiting for them to leap on him. He looked as if he felt anything they did was coming to him. George cleared his throat.

"Bill," he said, and his voice sounded strange and awkward. "We're gettin' up a football team from Oak Street. We gotta get aholt of a smart quarterback. We come to ask would you play with us."

"Would I?" Bill's voice broke. "Gee! What do you think?"

Mom tasted the salt of old tears, remembering. That was one thing everybody had to say about her boys. They never held a grudge. They had forgiveness in their hearts.

Not that they were angels. Thank heavens, no! There was that time she was out visiting and Frank got the idea of building a wood box right against the kitchen wall, and cutting a door through so Mom could just open it and get wood anytime she needed it without them having to take it in from the lean-to outside. George tried to talk Frank out of it, pointing out it wasn't an easy job. But Frank flared up.

"Just because you're fourteen doesn't make you President of the United States!" he grumbled. "You can quit worryin', because I'm (Continued on page 77)

The fighting Sullivans, off to join the Navy—all but Al. In the end, though, Al's wife insisted that he go along with the rest. "You belong with them," Kotherine told him. "It's always been the five of you. I want you to go, Al."

The boys secretly resented Katherine Mary's taking Al away from them. Thot was just at first, though. After they got to know her, then it was different. They all loved her. She was one of them.

Here they are—George, Frank, Joe, Matt and Al—the quintet that went to work for Uncle Sam, getting special permission from the Navy Department for all of them to be on one ship. The Juneau.

THE SONG OF BERNADETTE

(20th Century-Fox)

SPIRITUALLY and humanly, Franz Werfel's "The Song of Bernadette" has been transformed into a screen masterpiece. It brings an inspiring and impelling message to a war-torn world, a message which shows the miracles that can be wrought by true, reverent faith. Bernadette possessed exactly such indestructible faith in her vision of "The Lady." And with the devout who shared her belief she shared the miracle. She was a child of only fourteen when her vision first came to her in the filthy grotto of a dumping ground outside Lourdes. Enchanted by the one others could not see, she returned again and again to blaze a trail for suffering humanity who found healing in the waters of the spring that gushed forth.

Among the 850,000 readers of the Werfel novel are many who will demand nothing short of perfection in a performance of the role of Bernadette. They will be thoroughly gratified by the simple, moving sincerity of Jennifer Jones as the peasant girl. It is a strangely exacting portrayal which could not countenance a single false note. Nor does Jennifer commit the slightest misstep in creating the undefended and essential spirit of one who was pure in heart—one through whom men have learned to see the eternal truths which the common day veils from our feeble eyes.

You will exult in the glorious uplift of numerous distinguished contributions that deftly recapture the mid-Nineteenth Century period in the French Pyrenees. There is space to mention merely a few of the memorable characterizations: the priest by Charles Bickford, the archskeptic by Vincent Price, and the poverty stricken parents by Anne Revere and Roman Bohnen.

TENDER COMRADE

(RKO-Radio)

IN THE windows of America hang countless little service flags of red, white and blue. This is a story about the women who are proudly privileged to display these stars in honor of their men who are off to war. Specially, the tribute is paid to a typical cross-section of service widows who have assumed the industrial duties of husbands and sons for the duration and are living in memories until their men return.

"Tender Comrade" will accord you a glowing emotional experience in the theatre. Filled with deeply moving moments of lasting beauty, the drama attains unforgettable heights. Ginger Rogers gives a magnificent performance of a girl who, with chin up, is determined to aid however she can in the fight. It is her idea that she and three other war workers pool their rent expenses and share a home as patriotically as they share a car. It is she who thinks of seeking a housekeeper when the housework at night proves a hardship to the girls who labor all day. Her memories of the man she married are those we are invited to share, from the time of the proposal, down through the little irritations of wedded differences, to the last goodbye they said. With her, too, we are stirred to accept the challenge for protecting the peace that men are dying now to deliver to us.

There is glorious understanding in the portrait Ginger offers. Robert Ryan plays her husband with an honesty that is refreshing. Ruth Hussey does a colorful role of the most brittle member of the girls' household, Patricia Collinge is the woman with two sons in uniform, and Kim Hunter, the appealing schoolgirl of the group. Mady Christians is a treasure as the German-born housekeeper they find.

DESTINATION TOKYO

(Warner Bros.)

SOME day, after the war is won, the Navy Department may let us know the name of the real-life submarine captain whom Cary Grant enacts in "Destination Tokyo." His identity and that of the courageous crew have remained a military secret, even though it officially became known last May that an American submarine ran interference in Tokyo Harbor for the smashing aerial raid on Japan staged by Doolittle and his boys. Such an amazing cruise into enemy waters as the one depicted in this immensely exciting picture actually took place. It was brought off by men of intestinal fortitude spelled with a capital "G." Hollywood has filmed no finer war adventure than "Destination Tokyo." You can't afford to miss its tense excitement.

Cary is every inch the distinguished naval captain he portrays. John Garfield does a grand job of the torpedoman who enjoys bragging of conquests ashore; Alan Hale, the richly amusing cookie; and John Ridgely, the Japanese-speaking officer in command of the landing party. Newcomers Robert Hutton, as the kid, and William Prince, as Pills the pharmacist mate, are noteworthy. The episode of the emergency operation is borrowed from a true occurrence.

Fictionally, the submarine is called the U.S.S. Copperfin. It puts to sea under sealed orders, stops at the Aleutians to pick up the Japanese-speaking officer, repulses an attack by Zeros, and dodges through the mine fields in Tokyo Harbor by tagging a Jap transport. Weather observations are radioed to the Hornet for the benefit of Doolittle, then begins the fight to get away again. It's a thriller of war thrillers, but grippingly real and really dramatic.

A GUY NAMED JOE

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

ACCORDING to the creed of flyers, "pilots never die." At the elbow of every veteran or tyro in the air is the spirit of "A Guy Named Joe" to help when the going gets tough. What else can account for all the unexplainable happenings which make up the stories in the airman's lore? Amazing, unbelievable stories, but told as being true.

Call this a whimsey of the superstitious-minded, if you will. Yet somehow it is an enormously heartening notion which is widely believed by men whose bravery we celebrate on every front of this global war. There are gremlins, aren't there—imps of evil who make things go wrong? Well, why can't there be guys named Joe, too?

If in your enjoyment of this picture you are reminded of "Here Comes Mr. Jordan" by the cloud-covered flying field upon which Spencer Tracy lands, it may be well for you to recall that both fantasies were produced by the same man, Everett Riskin. From Lionel Barrymore, who enacts the "general," Tracy gets his first orders after the crash. He is assigned to be a Joe for a fresh kid just out of Boston Tech. It looks like a snap job, until the kid starts to fall in love with the charming ferry transport pilot whom Tracy loved on earth. There begins a strange and fascinating romance which has angles of the eternal triangle in the real and the supernatural.

But we're not going to reveal who wins the lady's hand. Irene Dunne is the lovely one in the Ferry Transport Service, and Van Johnson the kid from Boston Tech. Van had an accident on a motorcycle that hospitalized him while the picture was in production. It could be that Joes don't ride on handlebars.

GUNG HO!

(Universal)

THE story of Carlson's Marine Raiders and of their stunning hit-and-run raid on the Japanese stronghold on Makin Island. Their thrilling feat in August of 1942 made world headlines, not only because of the brilliant military strategy of the surprise attack, but because it marked America's first offensive in the war with Japan.

The picture that Walter Wanger has based upon this achievement by Carlson's hand-picked Marines is a first-class thriller that will hold you spellbound by the intensity of the battle sequences, certainly as stirring and exciting as any ever filmed. Real Marines worked before the cameras in these fights as part of their Raider training at Camp Pendleton. No tougher, rougher band of fighting men has ever been assembled than these fellows who wear the uniform of Uncle Sam. The title, "Gung Ho," is the slogan under which they are trained. Translated from the Chinese, it means "work in harmony," which is what they must learn to do to survive. Represented by that slogan is a whole new code of officer-men relationships. Fighting men are given democracy in the service equal to the free rights institutions they're offering their lives to help preserve.

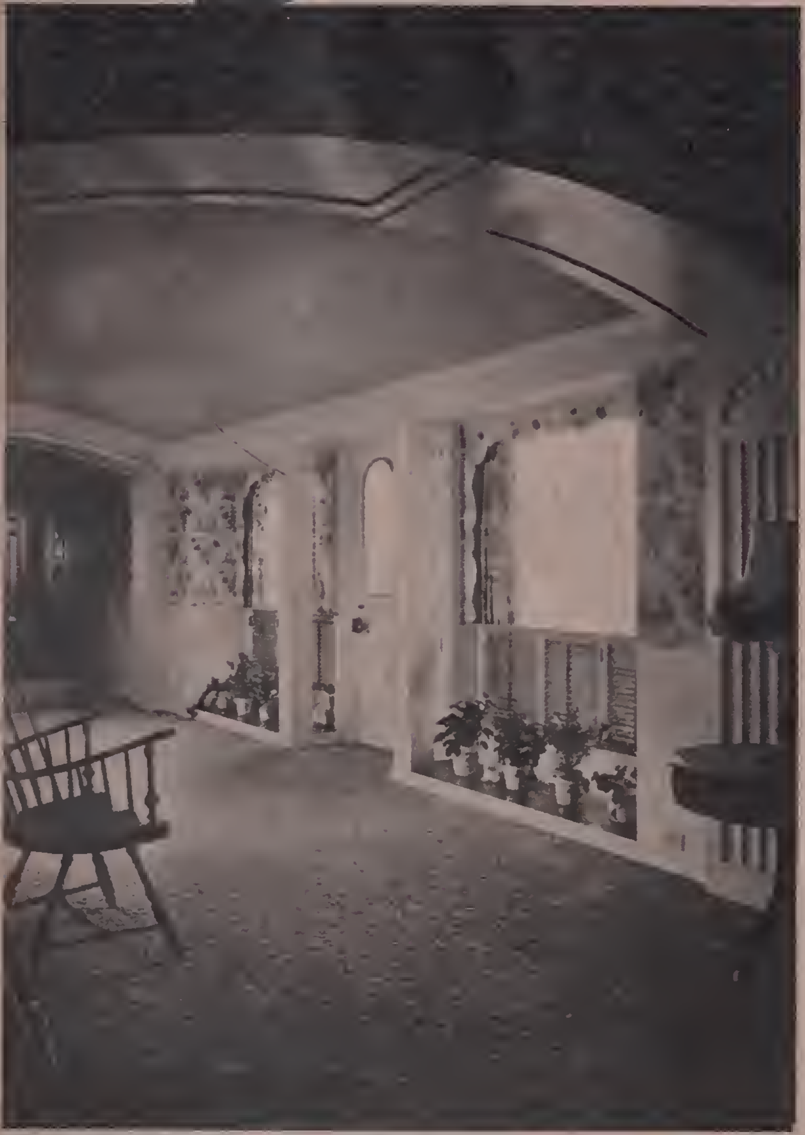
Randolph Scott plays the character who is the counterpart of Colonel Carlson. Surrounding him are such stalwarts in the ranks as Alan Curtis, J. Carrol Naish, Sam Levene and Rod Cameron. But there is small chance for individual performance honors in a cast that works in harmony like the men they impersonate. The story falters only when it tries to arouse interest in a pallid love thread which involves a couple of glimpses of Grace McDonald.

HOME OF A STAR

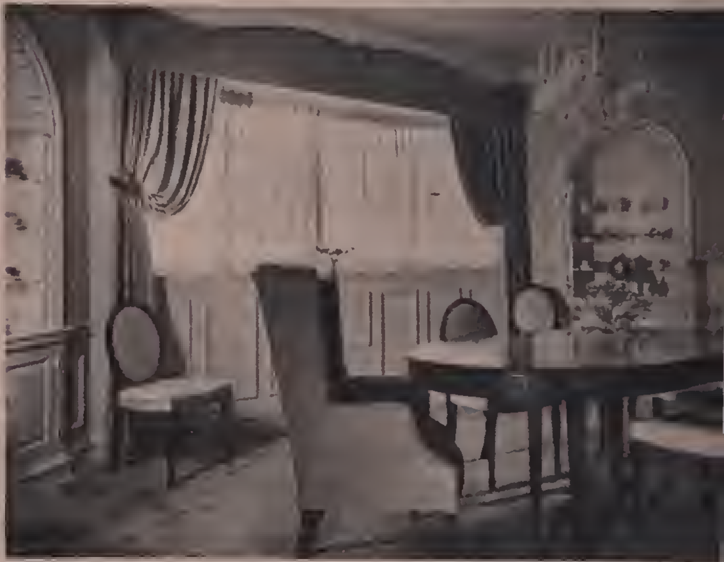
Deanna Durbin's

EVERY Sunday on Sunset Boulevard vendors sell maps to the homes of the stars. Many of the places are difficult to see because they are built high on the hilltops or behind secluded walls and dense shrubbery. Most interesting of all are the interiors of the homes which are never seen by the outside world. Movieland will bring to you in pictures a series of photographic features showing the rooms of the homes of the moving picture people. Here you will see their personalities as reflected in the rooms in which they live.

Herewith are pictures of Deanna Durbin's home. Here she came as a bride, and although recently divorced from Vaughn Paul, she goes on living here, surrounded by beautiful furniture and appointments. She has a particular love for fireplaces, and her fondness for rocking chairs is in evidence throughout. Because music is the background of her life there is a piano, an organ and a Capehart. Because she loves brown it is repeated throughout in decoration.

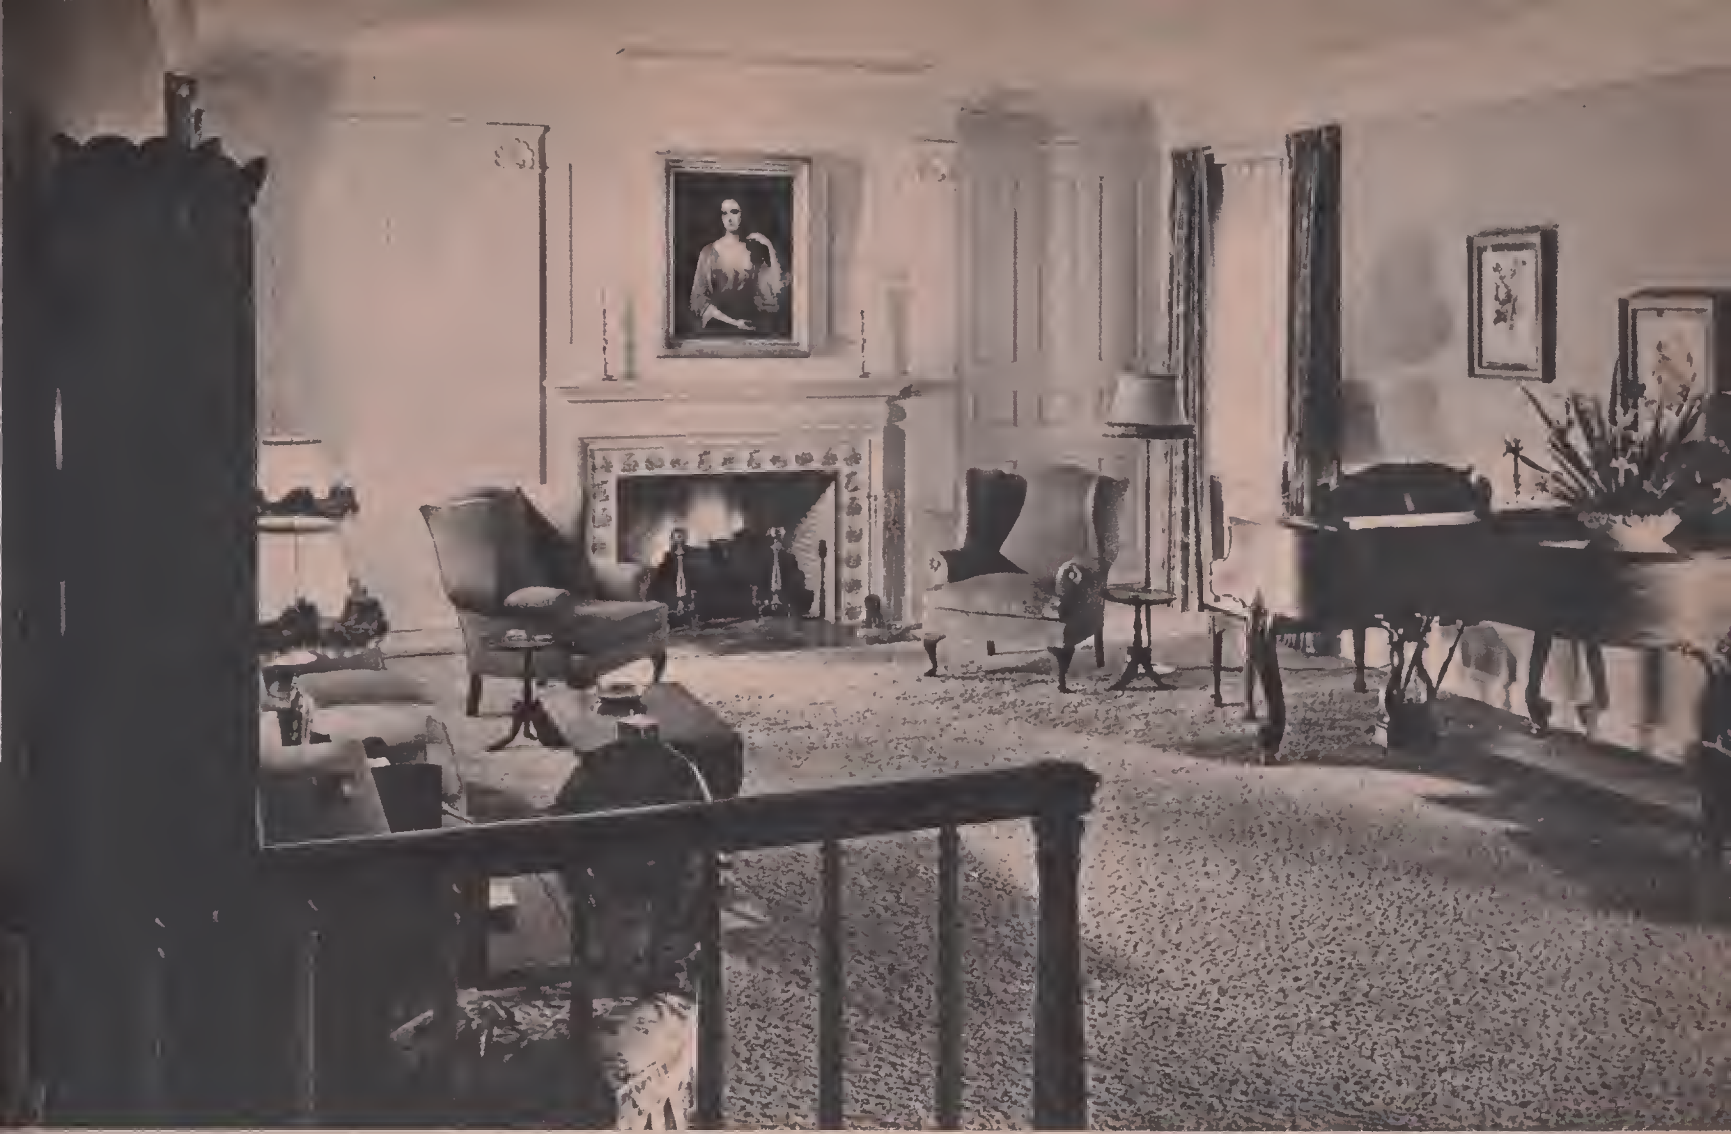


Through the paneled archway you see the entrance hall, with paned windows flanking the Dutch door and potted plants below to give an informal note. The curtains and covered walls are of printed chintz. The woodwork is ivory; the carpeted floors, dusty blue.

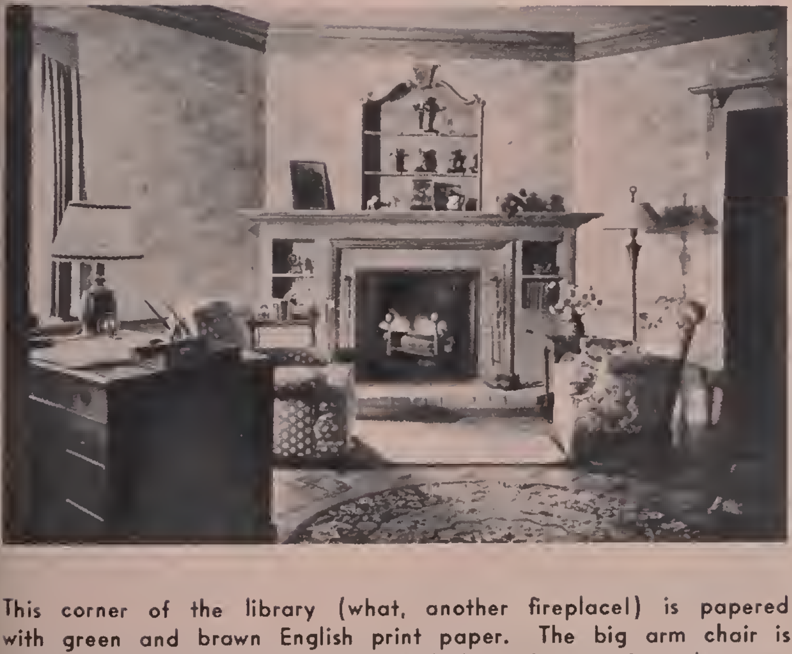


Peach colored glass curtains at the bay window cast a rosy glow in the dining room. Drapes and rug are apple green, peach silk shantung upholsters the chairs. In the corner cupboard Deanna keeps the coffee cup collection her family brought from England.

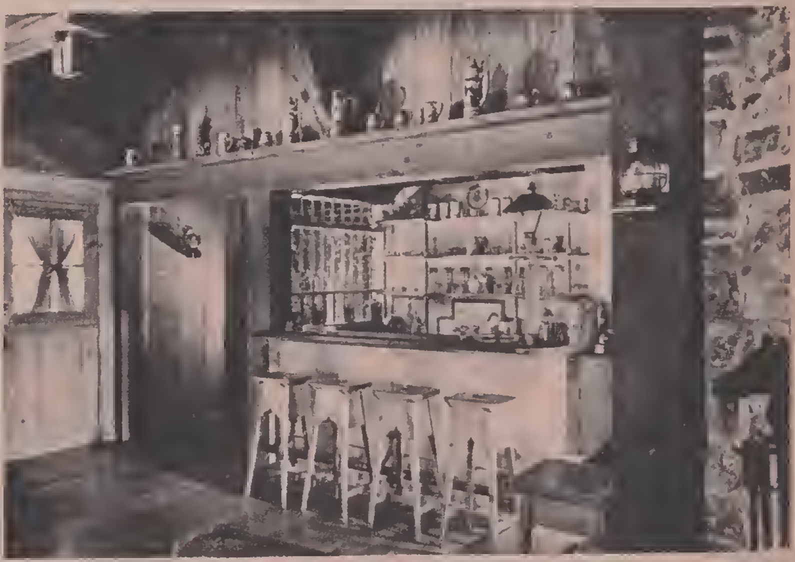
PHOTOGRAPHS BY MAYNARD PARKER



The living room is paneled at one end, encasing a fireplace. Around the fireplace, a border of Dutch tiles. Deanna's beautifully carved piano is a studio grand, and on the wall next to it are floral prints hung in quaint old gold frames. The rug is blue carpeting, heavily napped, and the two chairs by the fireplace are deep rose. Drapes are blue chintz with a floral pattern.



This corner of the library (what, another fireplace!) is papered with green and brown English print paper. The big arm chair is covered with brown print, and the little rocker is of apple green quilted chintz. For the floor, which is inlaid, hooked throw rugs.



Deanna Durbin's playroom, as in most Hollywood houses, is one of the important rooms. At one end is the paneled bar, on which is a lamp post. Above the bar is a collection of old English beer mugs and Toby jugs. The room is lighted with bronze wall lamps.

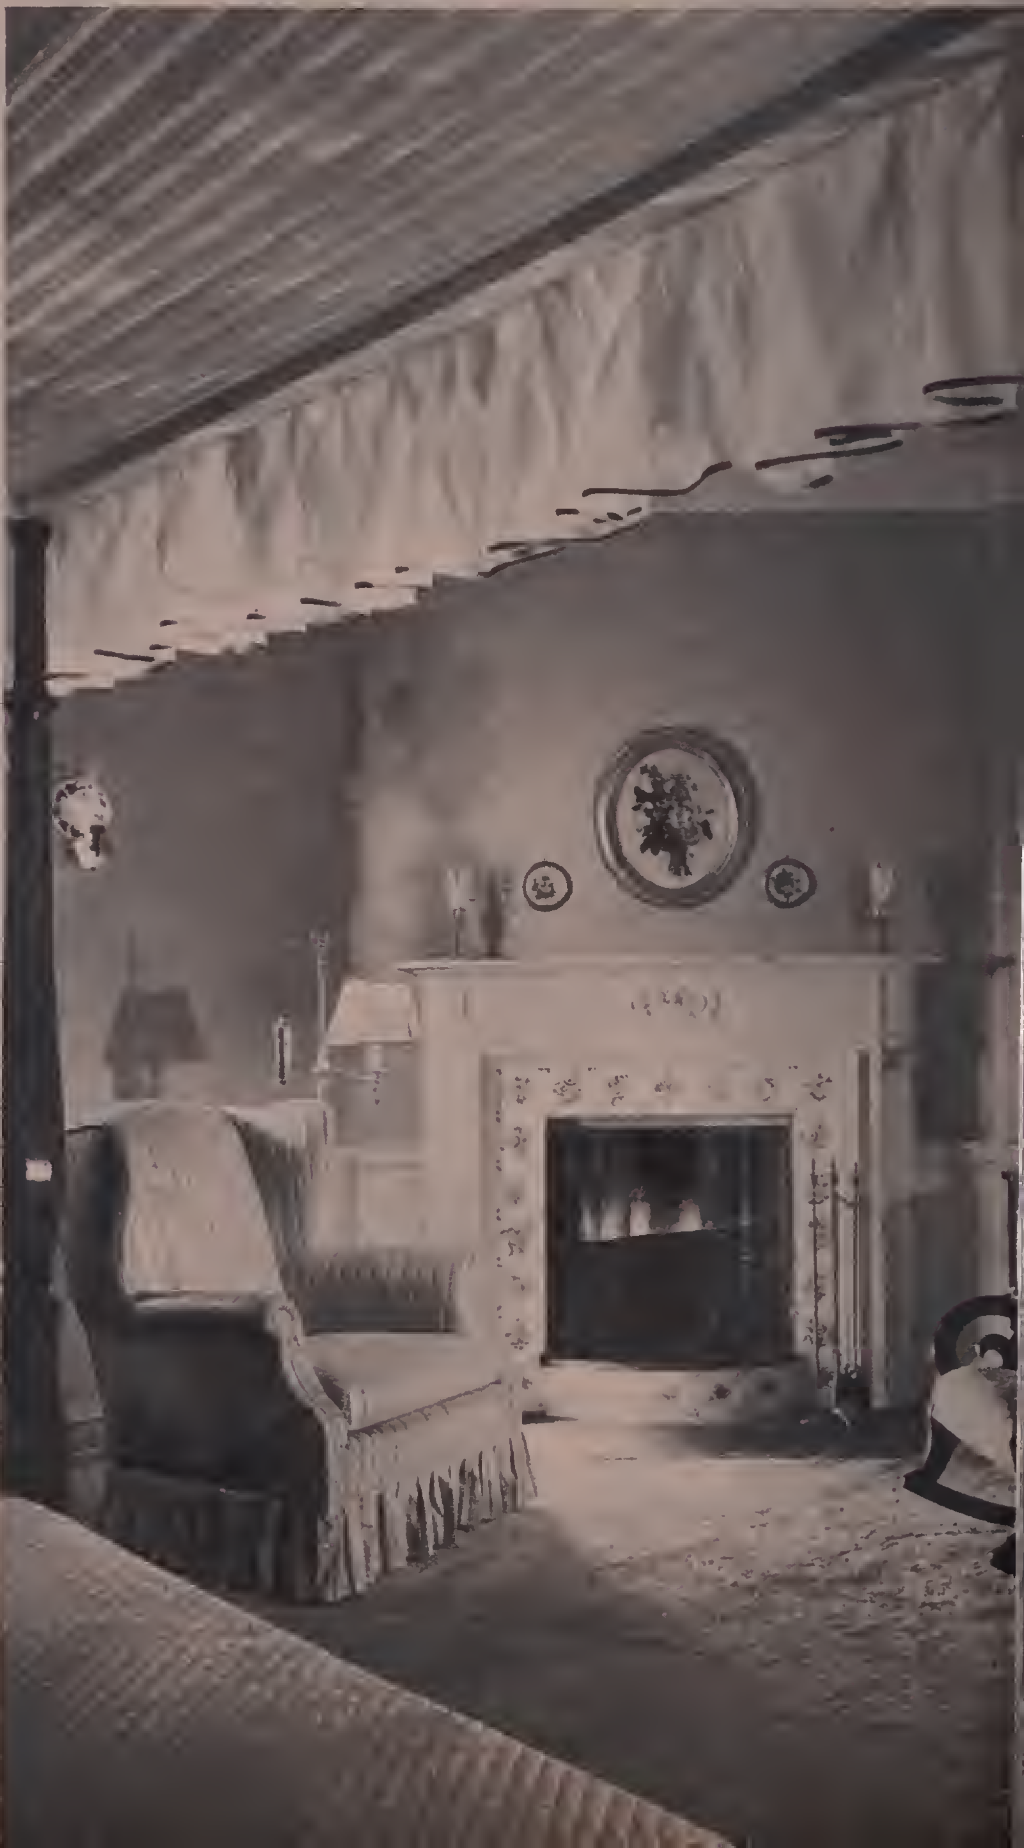
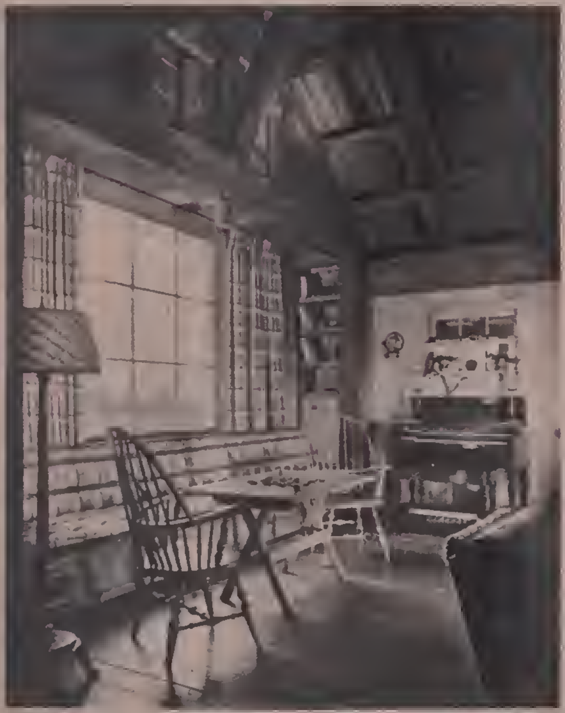
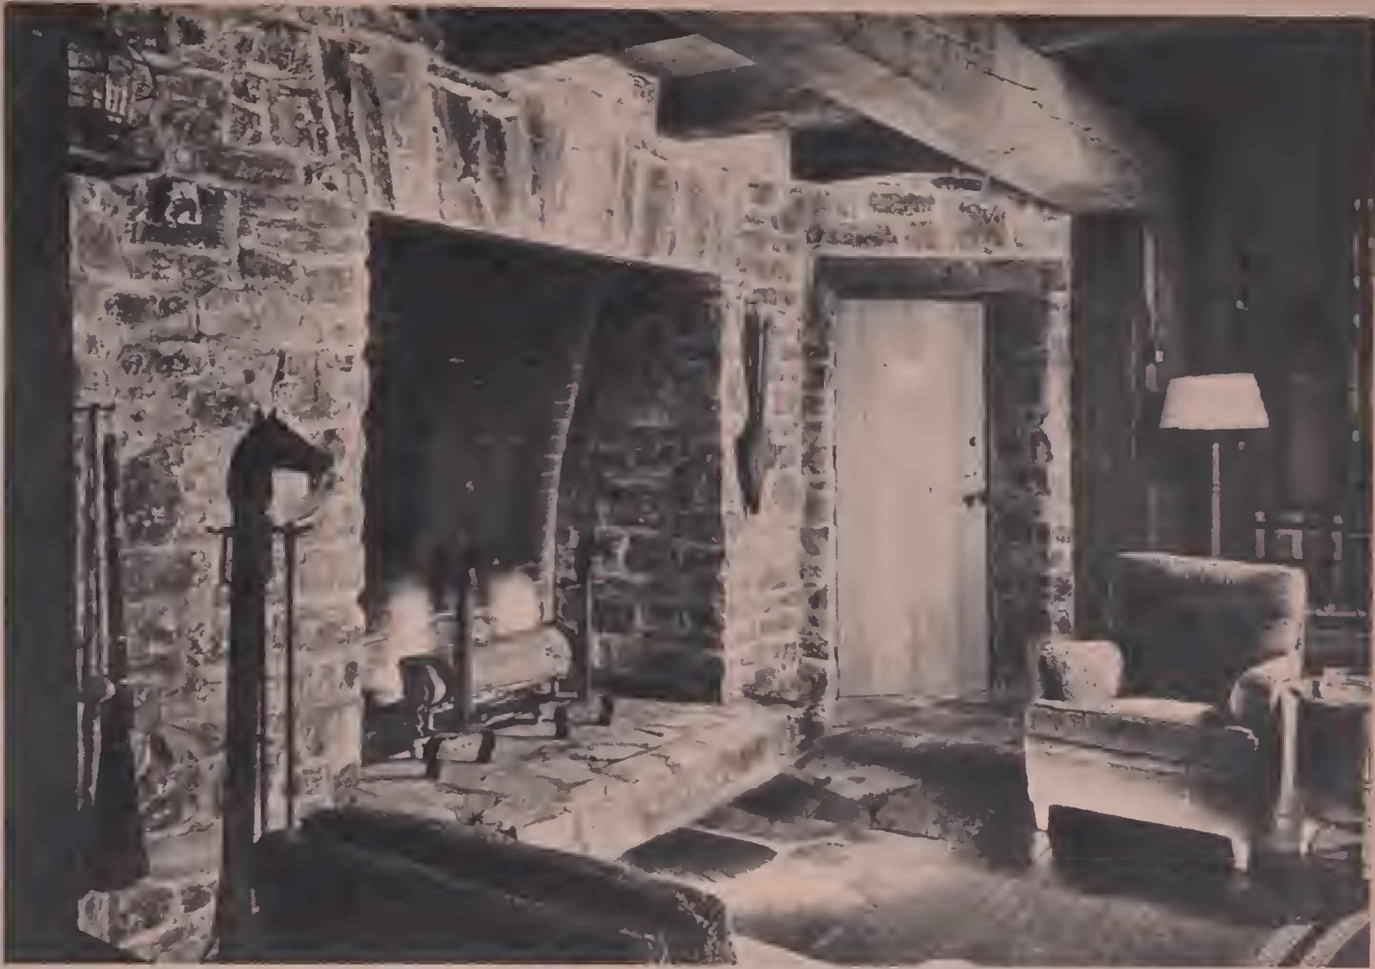
In a corner of Miss Durbin's bedroom is a dainty fireplace, with Dutch tiles for a colorful floral border. The rug is taupe colored, the arm chair is deep rose and the rocker is covered with a contrasting green and white print. The three walls we see here are brown striped paper.

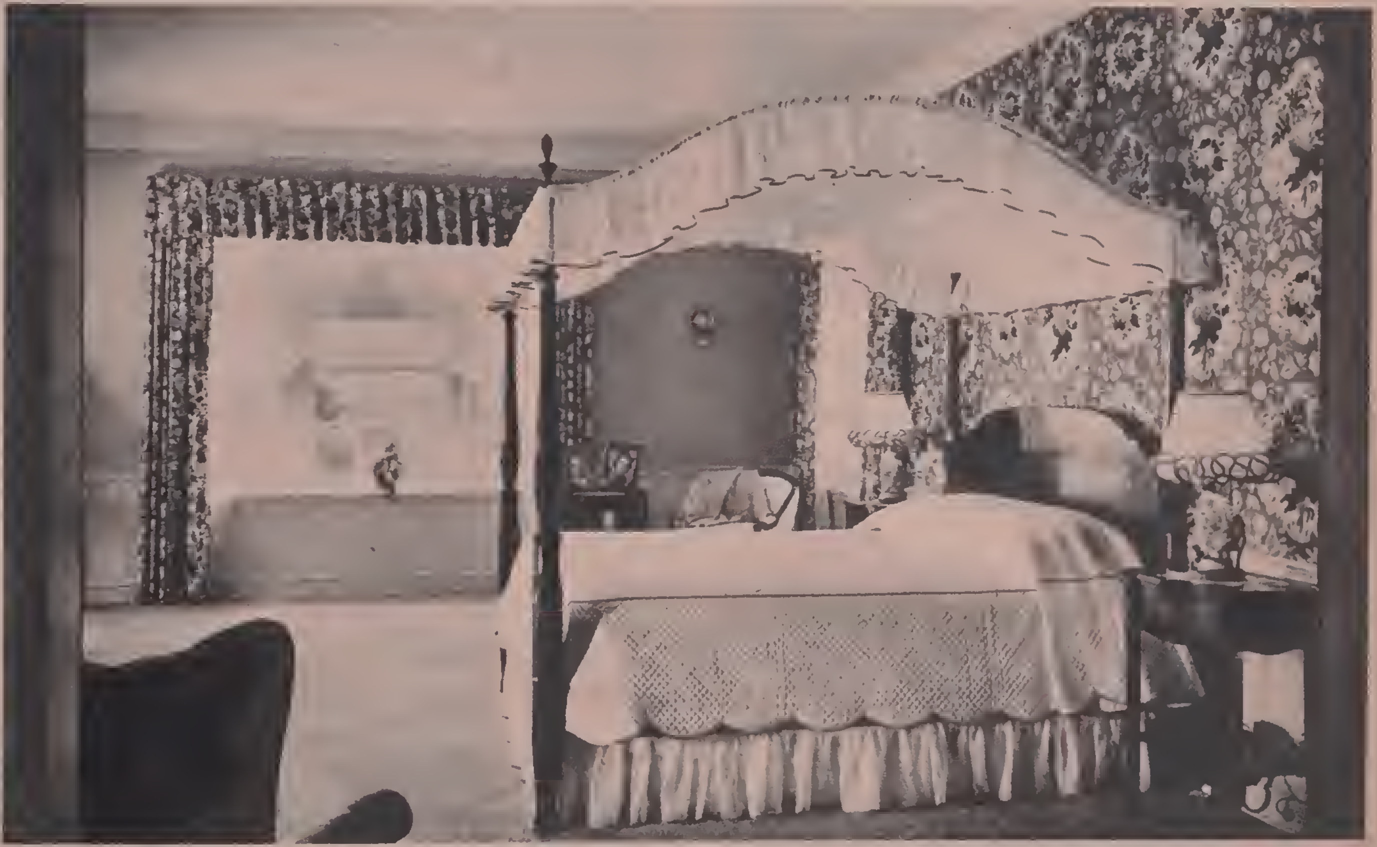




Walls in the playroom, where Deanna entertains more often than in her living room, are knotty pine; ceiling beams of dark wood. The curtains and window seat cushion are red plaid chintz, and her Hammond electric organ is spinet style.



This big rock fireplace at one end of the playroom—why, it's higher than Deanna is tall! An ingenious touch, too, was salvaging an old iron hitching post for a fireside set. Iron horses to match serve as andirons. The chairs at either side are covered with nubby green material, with a large hooked rug for the floor.



Deanna's mahogany bed is a four poster, against a wall covered with chintz, red and brown predominating, to match the draperies. White organdy canopy and the quilted spread are piped in green. White shades on the Dresden lamps at either side of the bed are also green-trimmed, picking up the colors from the rocker.

INTERIOR DECORATION BY W. J. SLOANE

Movieland Beauty Hints

BY MARIAN LONGACRE

ROUGE IS THE MOST ILL-USED of all cosmetics, according to leading makeup artist Wally Westmore. Rouge, says Wally, should primarily correct contours. On a round face blend rouge on the outer portion of the cheeks, carrying the color up to the temple and down to the jaw . . . making the illusion of a longer face. A long face, such as Loretta Young's, is rouged in circular pattern to effect roundness.

MAKEUP MISTAKE MOST COMMONLY MADE is the use of too heavy brow pencil. Brows should be penciled with a short brush-like stroke making each mark add to the appearance of a browlash. Only brunettes should use black pencil. Blondes and red-heads should use brown. Wally Westmore insists that red-heads do not add to beauty when using a pinkish red penciling. Brown is their best bet, too.

YOU WOMEN HAVE YOUR SHOULDERS TO THE RIVETER or your hand to the broom these days. For safety at work and symmetry for finger beauty, nails should not exceed one-eighth inch in length. This is a serviceable length for typists and war workers. If your job is more mental than physical then longer nails are practical. Liquid overcoats control splitting and breaking. If you wear dark polish continue the liquid coat to the end of the nail and under the nail tip for strengthening. Paulette Goddard's nails, which you see in the picture, are filed to give a tapering effect. She uses a clear colorless polish, which is a new fashion for spring. Pastel pinks are equally feminine and very wearable.

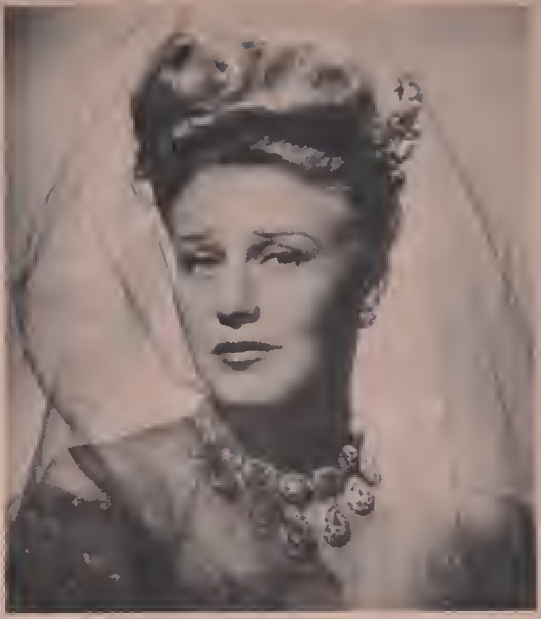
MUCH ADO HAS BEEN MADE in the past few years about matching makeup colors to costumes. Only if your clothes-color sense is correct! The idea is to suit costume and cosmetics to your natural coloring. Choose both to accent and accentuate; never to disguise. Don't use purple or orange rouges for cheeks or lips if they do not suit your complexion. Clothes are background for facial beauty, so consider your eyes, your hair, the texture and toning of your skin.

EDITH HEAD, LEADING DESIGNER at Paramount, knows more about line of clothes than slick chicks know of Sinatra. She makes a suggestion to help you while buying your Easter costume. Put a facial tissue mask over your face while trying on clothes. You then center your attention on the line of your figure. Because you more often see your mirror face than your full length figure you are inclined to put all of the attention to neckline and shoulders. Miss Head finds the mask compels us to lengthen that dumpy torso or hide that protruding derriere. Bows over skinny hipbones and corrective lines for a too-full figure make fittings more satisfactory. Hide your face, she says, till the figure is taken care of. Then you can remove the mask and beam at yourself.

FOR EVENING use a lighter powder and powder base and higher color. Electric lights pick up the contrast.

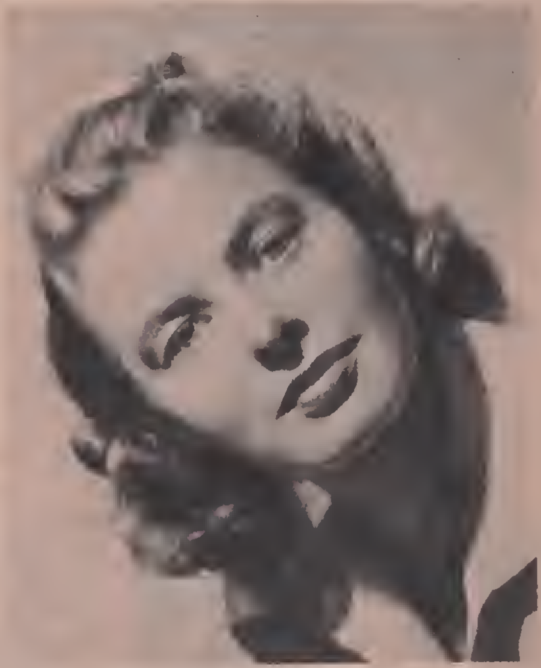
MAKE MASCARA HOLD to the lashes by powdering lightly over a first coat, then carefully applying a second.

FOR THE FUTURE Mr. Westmore predicts that pompadours will be smaller. Upsweep coiffures and long loose hairdos will lead the fashion field for civilians. Service girls will be smartly tailored with short cropped curls, simply arranged.



GINGER ROGERS' brows are thin and well shaped, giving her eyes a large wide-eyed appearance. To make facial balance, lipstick is carefully extended beyond the natural line of her lips, giving her mouth added fullness.

MR. WALLY WESTMORE shook his finger in my face and said, "You should spend fifteen minutes every morning applying your makeup." Being the sensitive type I fidgeted in my chair. When he saw that hurt look in my eye he added . . . "every woman should." Fifteen minutes a day gives a lasting makeup. Retouching of course is necessary but it can be kept to the minimum, says Wally, if you get off with the right start. Shown here, applying rouge to Dorothy Lamour, he forecasts a rosy complexion is the note for spring.



INGRID BERGMAN never wears makeup, even before the cameras, except a light base for color and lipstick to define the line of her mouth. Fresh natural beauty is one of the advantages she has which brought her to the attention of Hollywood bigwigs. She's one in a million, however, and it isn't advisable for you or me to follow her habit of no makeup. She can get away with it, to great advantage. That doesn't mean we all can.

THEY HOVER AROUND HUTTON

When Betty Hutton checked in at Paramount for "Incendiary Blonde" after a long tour of army camps, there followed after her thanks and thanks from the boys she had seen. They honestly just love Betty because she not only dances and sings, but she's such a naturally swell girl. When she rejuvenates "Oh Bi-Jingo" you'll see her in the sexiest costume to date. Designed by Edith Head, the scanty is of nude colored chiffon with pailettes in the proper places and white ostrich feathers giving a saucy swish. Incidentally, that Hutton-de Cordova romance is definitely not a romance.

Which reminds me. Here is the guest list at a recent party given for Bernard Newman, dress designer: Loretta Young and Col. Tom Lewis, Ann Sothern and Lt. Bob Sterling, George and Julie Murphy, Ray and Mal Milland, Arthur Hornblow, Jean Arthur and Frank Ross, Betty Hutton and Buck Woodward, Olivia deHavilland and the Herbert Marshalls.

Did you notice anything strange about the guest list? I do. Miss Betty Hutton right plunk in the middle of the quiet Brentwood-Beverly Hills set! It seems that Betty is giving up the gay gang she used to run around with and is specializing in the quieter groups, because she wants to be a great dramatic actress and thinks that one way to get producers to see her in this light is to quiet down.

FEM FAN FAVORITES

Top pin-up boy with the gals in the armed services is the great Coop. Gary Cooper, who has just completed a camp tour of the South Pacific, is the crowned king. Running a close second is Tyrone Power. After them comes John Payne. Both Power and Payne are in the service, but their studio sends out the pictures for them. Another favorite is Lt. Ronald Reagan, who reminds all the girls of their fellas. Alan Ladd is a close runner up as a dream man, and Spencer Tracy can sign as many pictures as he has time for.

REPORTING ON ROONEY

Just to keep you posted on the Mickey Rooney situation. He is dating every girl in town, including Vicki Lane and Gloria de Haven. His heart still belongs to Helen Mueller, cover girl, but she hasn't made up her mind.

Gloria de Haven is the cute trick with Mickey on this Hollywood premiere night date. It may not be love, but what a lot of fun!

MR. YOUNG GOES TO WASHINGTON

Handsome Gig Young and his charming young wife are now stationed in Washington, D. C. There is no prouder gal in the world than Mrs. Gig, who thinks her naval lieutenant husband is just about everything in the world.

The day he received his commission was to her the biggest day in her life, even bigger than the day he was announced for stardom in the movies. They are expecting a baby any minute, and things are just fine with them.

DISH-PAN MARINERS, REPORT HERE

Paulette Goddard and Jinx Falkenburg have learned to swap favors with the Marines. Jinx was visiting Paulette for a few weeks while Jinx's mater is vacationing in the East. The girls were doing their own housework.

On a bright Sunday morn, up to their elbows in suds, the gals were doing dishes hurriedly in hopes of getting off to the beach for the day. A knock came on the kitchen door. There stood three of the world's biggest Marines.

Autographs they wanted. Okay said Paulette—provided they would finish the dishes. While the kitchen work was done by the three Marines, Paulette and Jinx tidied up the house. They parted early, the Marines with their autographs, the brunette beauties off for a day of sun tanning. The boys didn't break a dish.

A SLIGHT CASE OF SHREWDNESS

She's sold her yacht to Charlie Chaplin. Sort of an ashes-to-ashes, dust-to-dust situation, for Paulette got her start with a nice nest egg from Chaplin when they were divorced. The Gorgeous Goddard is quite positively considered one of the wealthiest women in Hollywood. She's a business gal as well as an actress. Someone asked Chaplin how much dinero he thought Goddard has now. He said definitely more than he has. His tastes are so expensive.

ANXIOUS WIVES DEPARTMENT

Ida Lupino and Martha O'Driscoll were reacting as typical service wives. Their husbands were both on airplane carriers when one was sunk off the Gilbert Islands. Studio phones were kept buzzing when they checked on the lists. Neither husband was on the sunk carrier.

NO DATES WITHOUT CHAPERONES

It has been reported that Shirley is "going steady" with this boy and that. Shirley denies it and says she is playing the field. Besides, and we quote Miss Temple, she will be sixteen in April and it will be another year before she can go out with a boy unchaperoned. So what is this "going steady" business?

THREE-YEAR-WEDS REMARRIED

Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz were just married on January 15th.

Yes, we know they have been married for three years, but Lucille has just adopted Desi's religion and they wanted to be married in a church. For a marriage that all the wiseacres in Hollywood said wouldn't last, this one has done right well.

WHAT'S WITH THE WALKERS?

Everyone on the set of "Since You Went Away" watches the progress of the Jennifer Jones-Bob Walker situation. The first day the couple lunched together in the Selznick commissary, everyone nodded to each other in proud parent fashion.

This has happened frequently during the filming of the picture and the cast thinks that perhaps Jennifer can see her way clear for a reconciliation with Bob. The loving thoughts and wishes of Claudette Colbert, Shirley Temple and the bearded Monty Woolley might be helpful in bringing the Walkers together. Consensus is that Jennifer is heartbroken and wants her husband back, but is too proud to ask him.

SO VEDY MUCH DOMESTICATED

The Sonny Tufts have a house! Originally stymied with the housing shortage in Southern California, they resided in an auto court for months. Finally they found a house and bought it. It is in Beverly Hills and a small French Provincial type. The Tufts have gone domestic with a vengeance.

By the way, Mr. Tufts hates this "Cinderella Man" idea that his studio is publicizing him with. They say he is the young man who just got a job in pictures without even trying. Sunny says he has been working since he was fifteen just trying to get into pictures or a stage play, and it has been darned hard work. Hollywood, by the way, likes Mr. Tufts extremely well and is even more fond of his wife.

Mr. and Mrs. Sonny Tufts "dine out" at the Mocambo, but had to be hauled there by friends, on accounta the gasoline situation.

WHERE THE STARS GO TO EAT

The favorite eating places of your favorite movie stars are not what they used to be. Rationing has hit movieland just as it has hit your own home town. The Brown Derby in Hollywood has two voluntary meatless days, and the Derby out Beverly Hills way is closed on Mondays.

The Players, which Director Preston Sturges runs and where you dance as well as eat, makes no bones about now featuring dancing above eating. Time was when The Players had the best pantry in town, and many a movie star regretted what that extra Napoleon slice did to her hips. She doesn't have to worry now—that Napoleon slice just isn't there.

Lucey's, which is across from the Paramount lot and practically the Paramount star club, originally featured Italian food. Now Lucey's has gone back to the non-rationed type of Italian eats.

The haughty waiters at Mike Romanoff's are even more haughty these noondays. In funereal tones they simply announce before you order just what there is and what there isn't.

If you go to Musso-Franks on Hollywood Boulevard late in the week, just don't count on having any butter. They don't have any. The Cock 'n' Bull, the really deluxe spot, instead of the luscious roast beef that Garbo used to hide in the corner to eat, now features Philadelphia sausage, and not too much of that.

Favorite new, smart places are: Mrs. Weiss's Hungarian Restaurant in Beverly Hills where the lack of food is covered up with much gravy; Peppino's, the Italian spaghetti joint, is gaining every day in popularity; Chianti, also Italian, has a new popularity, but the saddest and greatest blow in town to all actors is that Schwab's Drug Store has closed for dinner. It was one of the most popular spots in town, but they just couldn't keep the fountain open, what with the lack of ice cream. Schwab's is sorely missed.

BUT IS THERE ANY FUTURE IN IT?

John Carradine likes miniature trains. He owns and operates one of the most complete sets in the West and is mighty proud of his "railroading." Sometimes he is called upon to defend his hobby (which is one of many), as when a director declared that "playing with toy trains is sissy business."

"Sir," said John at his Shakespearean best, "they are not toy trains; they are miniatures. And only highly intelligent persons can understand their appeal. They are informative, useful, productive . . . and I understand they've even taken the place of sex in some of the more effete homes in the East."

DARNELL TAKES TO DECORATING

For years Linda Darnell has pasted into a scrap book all pictures of interiors of houses that she liked.

When she and Pev Marley married and started to have the decoration of their new Pacific Palisades house done, Linda carefully showed the smart interior decorator her little pictures. The decorator wasn't as enthusiastic as Linda about them, and the result is that Linda is doing her own decoration, running from shop to shop with her book, saying "I want a sofa like this." "Do you have any small tables like this?"

Slowly but surely the house is taking shape and getting mighty pretty, too. Linda says it is costing just half what it would have through the decorator. Pev thinks she is even more wonderful now; so she is a happy girl.

THINGS JUST AREN'T THE SAME

Jackie Cooper is gone and June Horne, the Mocambo, The Players and Schwab's Drug Store miss him like sixty. Jackie is in the Navy Training V-12 and is enrolled at Notre Dame University learning to be an Ensign. He completed his preliminary training at Loyola University on the coast and then transferred to the big college.

Love Department: Rita Hayworth has returned to her natural black hair, on the orders of her husband, Orson Welles. Orson, who is noted for defying studio heads, issued the ultimatum to his bride and she obeyed.

Without Painful Backache

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

HEROES, HAYWORTH AND LONELY HEARTS

waiting for us, if we ever get back."

Not all of the letters are so vivid. Not every man can put into words just why it is that a picture of a cinema cutie in far off Hollywood has suddenly become to him a thing he must have.

Yet some brief letters are even more compelling. Like this one. Enclosed with it, when it came, was a picture of Rita, mud and blood stained, torn by the shrapnel that had pierced the chest of a boy who fell in Guadalcanal. The letter was written by one of his marine pals:

"Dear Miss Hayworth:

"I thought you might like to have this. They took it out of the pocket of my friend, Pvt. - - - - - -, who was killed in action. It's folded so small because he always carried it with him. You don't know him, but he said your picture always brought him luck. Sincerely, Pfc. - - - - - - - ."

Rita said, "That's what I mean by a letter that scares me. They expect so much of you. Letters from parachute jumpers, who want a picture or something to carry 'for luck when I hit the silk.' Letters from boys on boats, who ask you to be their ship's 'guiding star.' They think you can bring them luck—and so many times, their luck runs out.

"Here's another I'd like you to read. When you've finished, I want to tell you something about it."

The postmark was Seattle, Washington, but the letter was written in a pup tent on the frozen tundras of Alaska by a young army lieutenant, one of 1500 men who helped build the Alcan Highway:

"Dear Miss Hayworth:

"I have a story to tell. It covers the thoughts, experiences, emotions, adventures and hopes of a boy in the service for the last twelve months, in a lonely land.

"Setting: The great outstretches of a northern waste—the arctic, the land of the northern lights that constantly search the sky. Land of snow-covered mountains, glaciers, frozen lakes and rivers. A God-awful land, a cruel, lonely land.

"Characters: United States soldiers, white and black, Indians, Eskimos. Grizzly bears, moose, wild goats and sheep, caribou—and always the hungry timber wolves piercing the night with their howling.

"Just one thing of real, human beauty in this whole forsaken piece of universe, Miss Hayworth—your picture! You'll never know what it has done to lighten these twelve bitter months. Of all the lovely ladies the whole world over, you are the favorite in the hearts of the men here.

"Every day someone suggests that we write to that picture on the wall—to you, Miss Hayworth. We tell each other, 'Ask her for a date, go to see her on furlough, pour out your heart. Love her! Yes, love her—tenderly, effectively, gratefully. Love her for all of us. Make it real, but make it fast—for tomorrow we die.

"I hope to get a furlough soon and I would certainly like to tell our story to you—all of us would like to tell our story to you, but since that is impossible, maybe you can find time to listen to one of us."

The writer of that letter did come to see Rita at the studio one afternoon. His trip to Hollywood was financed by two hundred of his camp mates. He proved to be a clean-cut young chap. But back in civilization once more, he reverted to the young real estate man that he once was, a fellow who had never written a letter to a movie star in his whole life, much less a love letter.

"I think we were both a little ashamed about the whole thing," Rita explained, "until he started to talk about the work, and the cold, and finally the thrill it was when across the ice and snow, the two ends of the highway at last came together.

"He told me over and over how they would stand around nights and look at my picture—how they'd stand and talk to it! Do you know what I was thinking while he was telling me this? I was remembering how much I hadn't wanted to take the particular picture they had of me.

"The portrait sitting came up on a very busy day. I had a dance rehearsal, a script rehearsal and a singing lesson, all in a few hours. I had been out late at a party the night before and I wasn't in any too good a humor. To spend the whole afternoon grinning at the 'still' cameras seemed about the last straw.

"I gave up one afternoon—but grudgingly—and that particular picture brought pleasure to 1500 lonely men for one whole, long year. It doesn't seem possible one picture could do that much, but when you hear about it you wish you could personally go to all the forsaken spots in the world, and humbly ask for the privilege of 'pinning it up' yourself!

"Believe me, I'll never grudge another hour, or month, I give up to posing, no matter how I feel."

A photo is not all that is asked of a Pin-Up Girl. They are the most usual requests, but other requests come and they are varied. A bombardier asks for "a lock of your hair, to carry over my heart." A parachutist writes, "All the fellows here are asking Santa to bring them their favorite dream for Christmas—you are mine! More than anything, I want the print of your lips at the bottom of a letter. They give me goosebumps, honest! I'll carry your lips with me on all my jumps, and I promise you when I get into action you won't be ashamed of me!" An army chaplain goes down into history, asking her to adopt him, "to be my mental, but my very own, sister."

They want permission to name tanks after her, and guns—"please don't be offended, we claim it is the finest gun in the coast artillery, anywhere." The letters that really imbue you with a great sense of terrible responsibility, says Rita, are the ones that need important, personal replies.

These fall into two types. One sort is quite humble, with the writer not really daring to hope he'll hear from her. The one below was written by a private in training with the Motorized Division at Fort Jackson, S. C.:

"Dear Miss Hayworth:

"I am writing this letter in a shanty while on outpost duty just on th outskirts of the camp—out here where every little sound can be heard, and the only light in the darkness is a small dim lamp. I've been stationed here for some time and haven't any decent writing material, so will you please excuse the pencil? I was just lonely and wanted to talk to someone —mostly you.

"More than anything in the world, right now, I'd like to have a letter from you. Of course, I know you'll never find time to answer, but it's okay by me. Just to see your picture in our 13th Infantry book as a camp visitor gives me something to remember and fight for. Yeah, it may be true I won't become a hero like those thirteen boys who visited Hollywood, but you bet your life I'll try my darnedest to get a few of those Japs and Germans before one of them gets me."

"Of course, I'd like to sit right down and write to that boy," says Rita with a rueful grin, "to him—and all the other fellows who ask it. But the only possible way an actress could keep up a correspondence of that sort would be to give up her picture career—and then, hearing from her wouldn't have the same effect.

"I can barely find time to read all their letters, although I've worked out a system with my mother, my secretary and the mail department all helping me, to see that no requests for pictures go unanswered."

The Columbia mailing department opens all of Rita's mail and promptly mails out every photograph requested. The letters are then passed on to Rita's mother and secretary, who by a gradual process of sorting, decide the "special" letters she should see. They reach her then with small notations about their contents. One of the "specials" was postmarked from the U.S. Naval Hospital in Brooklyn, and written with unsteady hand:

"Dear Miss Hayworth:"

"I have been here in the hospital for going on seven months now, and as I have been confined to my bed that length of time and have just about run out of correspondents, I thought I would take a chance on getting an answer from my favorite movie actress.

"I know you are pretty busy, but I thought you might take time out to write to a service man who is just about done. That's what the Navy says—but I know better. I'm sure a letter from you would do more to speed me on the road to recovery than all the medicine in this hospital.

"When I think of all the damage the Nips have done to us, and that the Navy still wants to discharge me, I get desperate. If I possibly can, when I get out, I'm going to find a group of fellows like myself and take an independent hand in things.

"Why am I writing this to you? Well, perhaps you remember the time, about a year and a half ago, when you visited the Naval Training Station and taught some of us fellows to Conga. I was fortunate enough to be one of that group. Looking back on it now, it gives me courage.

"Won't you please write me?"

Rita did write, be assured, by return mail.

"The shortest letter I ever received was from Bataan," says Rita. "It had two lines—'One of our buddies here has a picture of you. We want to thank you—for being so lovely!'

"The rest of the page was taken up with signatures. I've never forgotten it. I think perhaps it's changed my whole attitude toward life, my whole character. When I think of those men in the hell that was Bataan, having me as a—well, inspiration—I feel so humble I can hardly bear it.

"I feel the need of every picture I make being gay, as only America is—or was before the war—gay. I want it to have that unbelievable, sassy American humor. To show, so wonderfully, the charm and glamour and wonder of our way of life. And as for me, personally—well, it makes me want to be good, really good, in every sense all the time."

That's the story of one "Pin-Up Girl," and probably the other girls' are quite similar.

They've been given war roles to play, and they take those roles seriously. There's more to this fad, it's plain, than meets the critical eye.

So call them "Pin-Up Girls" if you like, but you'd better smile when you say it. There are several million of Uncle Sam's service men to whom they're something super-special!

THE END

STARS' NIGHT AT THE NAVAL AID SHORE STATION

Hollywood backs another hospitality idea; a place where the boys find friendliness and good cheer—and pretty K. T. Stevens.

Mrs. Darryl Zanuck, a hearty worker at the Station, chats with Loretta Young and Loretta's handsome hubby, Col. Tom Lewis.

Using the same forthright approach he had used to get into pictures, Jim got a role in Guthrie McClintic's "Missouri Legend" seven days after arriving in New York. Then the usual Hollywood pattern began to operate. An Eastern movie scout discovered him and sent him back to Hollywood as a great dramatic find.

Even then, his roles were mediocre—until RKO tested him for the role of Mark Eisen, the doctor in "Kitty Foyle" with Ginger Rogers.

Now it just so happened that after he had finished high school, Jimmy had decided to become a doctor. He had studied three years of pre-medical at Austin Peay Junior College in Tennessee before transferring to Rice Institute in Texas. That knowledge, plus his now-proven dramatic experience, gave him something very real to contribute to his first major role.

His performance won him a long contract at RKO, and other leads followed until M-G-M borrowed him for "Omaha Trail" and liked him so well they bought his contract from RKO. By this devious route Jimmy got a long-term contract with the studio where he had first applied for work as an actor.

But he didn't really start clicking at M-G-M until "The Human Comedy," and here again was an echo out of his past.

As an enterprising youngster of thirteen, living in Florida with his family in the post-boom days, Jimmy had worked as a telegraph boy. That had all begun because he wanted a bicycle, and when Jimmy wanted anything he knew how to get it. Work for it. Earn it. Every cent of his meager salary went into a savings account for the bicycle.

One day, seeing a crowd around the bank where he had this fortune, he investigated. A notice read that the bank had failed. "Others in the crowd explained that I couldn't get my savings now," Jimmy said. "But their saying so wasn't going to stop me.

"I pushed by the guard at the door and went straight to the bank president. I told him I had to have my money; how close I was to getting the bicycle and how many telegrams I had delivered to earn it.

"Before I left I felt more sorry for the bank president than I did for myself. Tears rolled down his cheeks as he told me he couldn't pay me nor any of his other depositors.

"I never got my money, but it was a valuable lesson and has made me careful of investments ever since."

Jim's own experience as a telegraph boy gave him a depth of understanding and sympathy for his role as friend and adviser to telegraph boy, Mickey Rooney, in "The Human Comedy."

"The only security there is, is in having a little piece of land," James Craig says. "The one thing I'm sure of today is that I can eat tomorrow." And Jimmy loves to eat. That large frame of his requires plenty of stoking.

His love for the land goes back to boyhood summers spent on his grandfather's farm. "I get tremendous satisfaction out of producing things," he says.

Jimmy's first experience entirely on his own was an adventure the summer he was fourteen, when he started out to see something of the country, hitch hiking and working at farms to earn his food.

One night, tired and hungry, he came upon a lonely farmhouse where a sad, middle-aged woman gave him a hearty meal. Before he had finished eating, he learned that the woman's husband had died the month before and she was desperate for someone to run the farm and save the crops from ruin.

"I'll work it for you until you get a good hired hand," Jimmy volunteered with youthful enthusiasm.

The woman didn't question his youth or ability. Here was her bread cast upon the waters. Together, they got things going. Jimmy stayed a month and left only when the farm was running smoothly and a capable farm hand was in charge.

Now that James Craig has a farm of his own he is like a boy with a new red wagon. Ranching is not a fad with him. He did not wait until he was financially able to buy some proven, going concern with all improvements in. Instead, he searched until he found just what he wanted in five acres in the San Fernando valley. They were run-down acres, but Jim wanted to pit his energies against that soil and make it produce.

"I get my exercise out there," he says. He extended his hands to exhibit his calloused palms. "I got those even wearing gloves—wheeling wheelbarrows and throwing a pick.

"Other fellows go to the beach or play golf for relaxation, but I get my relaxation in work. You have to work any farm when you have six cows, two horses, 2800 chickens and 100 hens."

To save gas Jimmy rides a motorcycle back and forth to the studio, a distance of nineteen miles each way.

One of his recent pictures included a sequence in which he was to ride a motorcycle. The studio, not knowing his prowess, was searching for a double when Jimmy heard of it. It ended by the studio's renting his motorcycle and Jimmy's doing his own death-defying ride.

Mrs. James Craig was Mary Ray, a non-professional, and the satellite of their household is three and a half year old James, Jr., affectionately dubbed "The Bub" by his adoring father.

Jimmy isn't waiting for The Bub to grow up to become a pal. He taught James, Jr., to ride a horse even before he could walk. Now, the two of them ride together. The Bub's scooter is his motorcycle. Before shoving off for a scoot about the farm, he goes through the same motions, with sound effects, as James, Sr., taking off on his motor.

They've a lot in common, these two. Real man to man understanding. Jimmy never makes the excuse of being too busy to answer childish questions. He treats his son as a contemporary, often makes it a point to ask his opinion about things.

When Jimmy works with a spade or hoe, The Bub is right beside him with his own miniature tools, putting all his baby energy into copying his father.

"You're never too young to start learning," says James Craig.

Ida Lupino, Warner Bros.

MOVIE STARS ARE FANS, TOO

Rarely is one star an ardent fan of another star's; but when she is, the tricks to which, she will stoop to meet her favorite make the stratogems employed by ordinary fans seem pallid.

There's the case of Ida Lupino. Ida is an ordent fan of Fred Astaire's. When Fred was appearing on the radio, she never made engagements for Sunday afternoons. Those were the afternoons on which Fred broadcasts; and though he wasn't any great hit on the air, Ida thought he was wonderful.

But Ida had never met Fred, and she kept hoping that some day she would. Then one day she attended a large formal affair at which Fred was present. But so were dozens of other stars. All evening Ida hung around Fred, hoping someone would introduce them. However, all her friends took it for granted that they had met.

Hours passed, and still no introduction. Finally Ida saw Fred making for the door. Quickly she gauged the distance to the door, and deliberately bumped into him. She said, "Oh, pardon me, Mr. Astaire, I'm so sorry! I'm Ida Lupino."

Unless he happens to read this, Fred will never know that Ida bumped into him on purpose.

BATTLE OF THE BEST SELLERS

her sparkling performance as Kitty Foyle. Yet Ginger had no more to do with RKO's purchase of Christopher Morley's book than Greer Garson did of Jan Struther's.

"Kitty Foyle," like "Mrs. Miniver," was already on the book stands, and rolling along in about fourth place on the best seller list when David Hempstead, who had just joined RKO as a producer, read the book. He hesitated a bit. After all, the other studios had ignored it. "The same old story of an other-side-of-the-tracks romance," most of them said.

But Hempstead had what Hollywood calls an "angle." He made a trip to New York, persuaded the then president of his company, George Schaeffer, to let him spend fifty thousand dollars of RKO's then very slender assets to buy "Kitty Foyle." Several months later came the picture which not only won an Oscar for Ginger, but also put RKO back on its feet financially, being by far its most successful venture in three seasons.

No wonder a few days ago, when the same David Hempstead read an original screenplay by Dalton Trumbo (who incidentally did the screen adaptation of "Kitty Foyle") and sent it to La Jolla for Ginger to read, the little lady took time out from her honeymoon, read the script, and yelled over the phone to Hempstead that she would make an extra picture this year for RKO if it could be that story. It's called "Tender Comrade" now, but the title will doubtless be changed. And the part of the young wife whose soldier husband is at the fighting front will give Ginger an excellent chance for another hunk of bronze for her mantel.

Did Veronica Lake ever dream Paramount would cast her as the German refugee in Somerset Maugham's best seller, "The Hour Before the Dawn?" Did Monty Woolley have any idea he would play the "Pied Piper" when 20th Century-Fox bought the book? Indeed not! Nor did Jennifer Jones have any notion she would be chosen to rise to stardom as little Bernadette Soubirous in "Song of Bernadette," or Diana Lynn in "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay," or Roddy McDowall in "How Green was My Valley," or Arturo de Cordova in "Frenchman's Creek," or Robert Walker in "See Here, Private Hargrove," or Gail Russell in "The Uninvited," or Gig Young in "The Gay Sisters."

What new sparkle will be added to what stars with Margaret Steen's "The Sun is My Undoing," or Rachel Field's "And Not Tomorrow," or Dr. Cronin's "Keys of the Kingdom," or Pearl Buck's "Dragon Seed," or Louis Bromfield's "Mrs. Parkington," or W. T. White's "They Were Expendable," Lloyd Douglas' "The Robe," Marcia Davenport's "Valley of Decision," or Betty Smith's forthcoming fine novel, "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," no one knows. But these best sellers are all on Hollywood's current production schedule, and all were selected by studio "brain trusts."

War shortages and longer playing schedules have resulted in a smaller number of important pictures being made by all studios. Hence the choice of stories for these pictures must be even more carefully made. And the smartest and most successful stars will continue to let other people pick their vehicles for them, people who are able to estimate a story objectively, considering all its values, and not only the attractiveness of some individual role or scene. Clark Gable, pardon me, Capt. Clark Gable, one of the smartest and long one of Hollywood's brightest stars, once gave an interview which went something like this:

INTERVIEWER: Mr. Gable, you have been among the first five box-office stars for the past ten years. To what do you attribute this sustained popularity?

MR. GABLE: To the fact that my studio picks my stories, my directors, and my leading ladies.

INTERVIEWER: So help you?

MR. GABLE: So help me.

The chief of one of our biggest studios has a copy of this interview, magnified many times, hanging over his desk for all to see. And it's a word to the wise.

whole affair impresses as a film without false fanfare. It ranks below "So Proudly We Hail" and above "Cry Havoc," two films which dealt with American nurses serving in other theatres of war.

THE MIRACLE OF MORGAN'S CREEK (Paramount) tells a bawdy joke which will undoubtedly offend more people than Preston Sturges bargained for when he wrote and directed it. Ladies in particular will resent the smoking-room manner in which Sturges boisterously waxes gleeful about marriage and motherhood. The miracle is that a silly small-town girl named Trudy Kockenlocker married a soldier with whom she danced one night at a canteen and subsequently gave birth to sextuplets, thereby gaining international attention for the town of Morgan's Creek. Norval Jones is the patsy of the joke, and he gets into a mess of trouble by attempting to help Trudy keep the secret of her wedding to the soldier whose name she can't remember. She thinks it was something like Ratziwatski.

Sturges also hoped to keep the secret of the climax of his yarn which co-stars Betty Hutton and Eddie Bracken as Trudy and Norval. The story synopsis issued by Paramount coyly announces that "the last sequence isn't on paper, as yet, but Sturges has everything solved." It is a "miracle," indeed, how the bad taste of the solution was passed by the Hays' office.

TARZAN'S DESERT MYSTERY (RKO) has, ho-hum, those nasty Nazis running all over the place again. There have been really flocks of them this month, and unless you are a dyed-in-the-wool Tarzan addict, you can skip his adventure in the desert. Jane, his mate, is still absent in England, but she writes to him asking for fever medicine for the soldiers. In search of the medicine, Johnny Weissmuller as Tarzan encounters Nancy Kelly as an American magician who has strayed from the troops she came to entertain in Africa. She has a vital message to deliver to an Arab chief and does so, after Tarzan, Boy and Cheeta, the chimp, come to her aid. And there you have it.

CALLING DR. DEATH (Universal) is the first of a new series of Inner Sanctum murder mysteries to reach the screen. It is a substantial tale about a doctor who has to prove to himself that he did not kill his own wife. You will enjoy the performances of Lon Chaney as the medico, Patricia Morison as his nurse, and J. Carrol Naish as a believable detective. The solution is especially logical.

UNIFORMED HITCH HIKING in HOLLYWOOD

Jack Holt tells an interesting story about a young Marine who flagged him down one afternoon. It turned out that the boy, who was barely seventeen, was on liberty and didn't know a soul in Hollywood. What was worse, he was broke. Payday didn't come before he got his pass.

Holt, with a son in the service, was more than kind. It was dinner, the theater, and a bed at his house for the night. Then he staked the boy to bus fare, gave him his phone number and told the young Marine to call him up whenever he came to town.

The Marine telephoned about an hour later. He said he had to see Holt right away. He had something to tell him.

Holt jumped into his car and drove down to meet the boy—who had a confession to make. He was AWOL. He was about to desert and go back home, but because Holt was so kind, he just couldn't. He had to tell the truth. He wanted to be driven down to the recruiting headquarters in town to give himself up. Jack drove him down. The boy had been homesick and had given way to an impulse. There was no real harm in him.

match Dinah's blue dress, of which more presently. For something borrowed, I gave Dinah an old charm bracelet of mine. I got extra cash for the license clerk and the judge. I got a prayer book for Dinah to carry, because I knew that was one of the mementoes of my own wedding I had missed the most.

It was funny about Dinah's dress. We went wildly shopping and the only one we could find that she liked—a pale blue crepe with short sleeves and a "V" neck—was a dinner dress. We couldn't see that for a Las Vegas elopement, so we had the skirt chopped off, and told the fitter Dinah simply had to have the dress for a Command Performance Saturday night (which as you probably know, is about the most invisible of all broadcasts since it is exclusively beamed out for our troops overseas).

Dinah did make that broadcast, though, singing magnificently, while our wedding party, Shirley Mitchell and her fiance, Paul Weston, Rufus and her husband and George and I, stood there, having the shakes and watching her.

Believe me, I don't know how she did it. Never was there a more perfect example of how "the show must go on." There she was, only about to elope, and all excited about the suddenness of it, just a few seconds before she went on the air, but who'd have known? Who could have guessed that she was so soon to be a thrilled young bride?

The moment she finished we started out. Dinah was hungry. The only place we could find open was a joint where the hamburgers were smothered in onions. Such romantic food! Dinah agreed to eat them if George would. Right that moment George would have agreed to do anything,

No gas? So this is the answer! It's Robert Alda, cast to portray the late George Gershwin in "Rhapsody in Blue."

To People who want to write
but can't get started

Do you have that constant urge to write but the fear that a beginner hasn't a chance? Then listen to what the editor of Liberty said on this subject:

> "There is more room for newcomers in the writing field today than ever before. Some of the greatest of writing men and women have passed from the scene in recent years. Who will take their places? Who will be the new Robert W. Chambers, Edgar Wallace, Rudyard Kipling, and many others whose work we have published? It is also true that more people are trying to write than ever before, but talent is still rare and the writer still must learn his craft, as few of the newcomers nowadays seem willing to do. Fame, riches and the happiness of achievement await the new men and women of power."

so a mere hamburger couldn't faze him.

The moment she had eaten, Dinah fell asleep. We could have killed her. The rest of us were wide-eyed and nervous, but not the bride. She not only slept all the way up there but all the way back. Such contentment. George did the driving, with Dinah serenely slumbering on his shoulder.

When we hit Las Vegas, we sneaked out of the car. We didn't want to be held up by the rah-rah of publicity then. We began creeping into the Court House, when I looked over my shoulder at the movie theater opposite. What would be playing but "Thank Your Lucky Stars," Dinah's first released movie, and there were big heads of her decorating the lobby. Fortunately, however, nobody did recognize us.

It was freezing cold. Dinah insisted upon changing into her bridal dress, even though the only available place was an icy ladies' room. Shirley insisted she couldn't look at George, right before the wedding, so Dinah had to go through the darnedest contortions, talking over her shoulder to him, telling him where her suitcase was in the car.

With numbed hands, we helped her dress. Dinah put her fur coat on top of the dress, and we emerged into the judge's chambers, and the ceremony was half over before she stopped shivering long enough to slip out of the coat even half way. In fact, the judge wanted to have the wedding downstairs in a bigger room, but Dinah said through chattering teeth, "No, no. Let's stay here where it's warmer."

We started right back the moment those lovely words, "I pronounce you man and wife" were spoken, and Dinah and George started arguing as to which one had promised to obey whom. Within two sentences they decided it didn't matter, they were both so happy—whereupon the bride went straight back to slumberland on her groom's shoulder.

They had three days of honeymoon before George had to leave again, at the end of which Dinah and I were on our rationed conversations once more. George owns a ranch in Montana and Palmer owns an island off the coast of Virginia, and when the war is over we plan to visit one another, first one place and then the other. Palmer is very like George, so I know they can become the kind of pals Dinah and I are.

The only thing that bothered me right after the wedding was that I had no other couple to work on with my matchmaking wiles, until Gene Tierney fixed me up. Gene is also one of my closest girl friends and her little daughter is just the age of my own son.

You get it, don't you? Gene's daughter. My son. Twenty years from now, when they are twenty years and two months old, you may expect me right there in the orchid, rice and prayer book departments playing Mrs. Cupid, fixing things up.

Why heck, twenty years after that (after all, I'll only be a tidy sixty-two), I hope I'll be playing Danielle Cupid to their children, also. For that's the way, despite wars and loneliness and pain, I like to think that life will be; generation after generation finding out that love in marriage is the most perfect state of existence there can ever be.

THE END

Pin-up picture for the man who "can't afford" to buy an extra War Bond!

YOU'VE HEARD PEOPLE SAY: "I can't afford to buy an extra War Bond." Perhaps you've said it yourself . . . without realizing what a ridiculous thing it is to say to men who are dying.

Yet it is ridiculous, when you think about it. Because today, with national income at an all-time record high . . . with people making more money than ever before . . . with less and less of things to spend money for . . . practically every one of us has extra dollars in his pocket.

The very least that you can do is to buy an extra $100 War Bond . . . above and beyond the Bonds you are now buying or had planned to buy. In fact, if you take stock of your resources, you will probably find that you can buy an extra $200 . . . or $300 . . . or even $500 worth of War Bonds.

Sounds like more than you "can afford"? Well, young soldiers can't afford to die, either . . . yet they do it when called upon. So is it too much to ask of us that we invest more of our money in War Bonds . . . the best investment in the world today? Is that too much to ask?

bossing this here job, get that straight."

"Okay, boss." George swept him a mock salaam. "Suit yourself, boss. Go right ahead, boss. But don't say I didn't warn you, boss."

"You get out!" Frank shouted.

"I'm gettin', boss." George grinned infuriatingly. "Me an' my comic book will be right upstairs, boss. When you get in a jam be sure and don't call me."

The jam wasn't long in coming. It was awfully hard cutting through the kitchen wall and even Frank was a bit worried when he saw what it was doing to Pa's prize saw. But it wasn't until that jet of water spurted out into their faces that they realized they'd damaged the water pipes. George wasn't aloof, though, when he saw they were on a spot. He was fixing the pipe when Pa came home.

Pa had a quick temper. He started right in yelling at George and wouldn't give him a chance to explain, grabbing him and jerking him to his feet. He was about to hit him when George's own temper flared and he started slugging it out with Pa. Mom was sickened when she came in and saw what was happening.

"You can't go fightin' your own sons!" she gasped. "Punishing them is one thing. Brawling with them is another."

"Oh ho!" Pa shouted in white heat. "It's not enough to come home and find the house destroyed. Now you gotta tell me how to raise the kids! Okay, Mrs. Sullivan. You know so much about how to handle 'em! Bake 'em a cake! Kiss 'em for what they've done! But don't ask for me to watch!"

He stamped out of the room and George left, too. Only George didn't come home for supper. Pa didn't eat much, either. "Waitin' to be coaxed," Pa said. "He'll wait a long time before I coax him." But right afterwards he put on his hat and said he was going to get tobacco.

They all made excuses to go and look for George, one after the other, but it wasn't any use. Mom didn't sleep a wink that night. Then as she was making breakfast George marched into the kitchen.

"Oh, darlin'," Mom breathed softly. "Never do that again."

"I ain't staying, Mom," George said shortly. "Not after what he done. He hit me. I hadn't done one single thing and . . ."

"You shouldn't have raised your hand to your father, George," Mom said quietly. "That's him coming now. You're to ask his pardon." Then as he stood there staring, she patted his arm and whispered, "For my sake, Georgie."

After that what could George do? But Pa made it awful easy for him, even though he couldn't bring himself to say he had been wrong, too.

"Skip it, son." That's all he said. "All Irishmen see red every so often." And then later, as he looked at the whole family sitting around the kitchen table, he cleared his throat. "I guess that oughta learn us Sullivans to stick together," he said.

There were so many, many things, so many that even Mom couldn't remember them all. But Pa was a good father to 'em. He was understanding even though his methods were a bit spartan at times—like when he found them smoking cornsilk cigarettes on Mom had always wanted them to be happy and find nice girls for themselves, yet she couldn't get over that feeling of apprehension every time one of them went around looking mooney-eyed. And she who'd always gone on so about mothers who were jealous of their son's girls!

But none of them had serious intentions, until Al met Katherine Rooff. It was at a dance, and at first Al didn't even see any of the girls because it was so swell to see Bill Bascom again. Gosh, it was funny thinking of Bill being a real sailor on a battleship. The Arizona, too!

When Al was dancing with Katherine he knew she was different. She was a keen dancer. After a while, though, Al knew he wanted to get her away, and he was glad when her heel came off one of her shoes so he had an excuse to take her off the floor while he fixed it.

There'd always been a moon and stars but Al never really saw them before that night, standing by a rock outside the dance hall, hammering the heel back on Katherine's shoe.

"Don't bother, Mr. Sullivan," she said archly. "You'll miss the whole dance."

"'S no trouble," Al said. "It's nice out here."

"It's beautiful," she said in a dreamy voice. "I don't care much about dances anyway and a lot of people clowning around. It's funny, but in the middle of a crowd oftentimes I feel so alone."

"Yeah?" Al was impressed by the profoundness of this brand new idea. "Me, too," he said. "Right in the middle of a crowd, it's like I was all by myself." Then embarrassed at having gone so completely overboard, he handed her the shoe. "Try this for size," he said.

Katherine's eyes were shining as she put it on, holding on to Al's arm to steady herself.

"I didn't think anybody felt like I do about so many different things," she said.

"I do," Al blurted out. "And do you know what else? I think you're swell. I knew right off, the minute I saw you." It was hard for Al, who had never been around much with girls, to say all this. But once having got started he found the courage to go on. "Say, you've sure got a small wrist," he said, looking down at her hand on his arm. "It's just about the smallest wrist I ever saw on a girl. It's real slender. Here, look at it compared to mine."

He put his own hand against hers and the contact thrilled him. It was like an electric current going from her hand to his, and he couldn't help taking her in his arms and kissing her.

It was the most wonderful thing that had ever happened to him, with her lips returning his kiss. But as soon as it was over Katherine looked at him with indignant, hurt eyes.

"Take me home!" she demanded. "Take me home this minute! Somebody you only just met! Only an hour . . . I guess you think I'm common and cheap, kissing a fellow I only just met."

"No." The word was torn from Al's tortured lips. It was awful seeing a girl cry, especially a girl like Katherine. "Nothing you could do would make me think you were anything but sweet and lovely. I couldn't even respect my own mother more than I do you."

And then with her looking at him that way, so sweetly forgiving, there wasn't anything else to do but kiss her again, to prove how much he respected her.

"But it's going to be pretty tough trying to sleep tonight," he said.

"Me, too," Katherine echoed fervently.

Mom thought at first it would blow over, the way things had with the other boys. But it didn't. She had an awful sinking in her heart when he asked if he could bring Katherine home for dinner one night. She hadn't thought it was going to be so hard losing Al. Then besides, the Rooff's had more money than the Sullivans. They even had a hired girl. Mom was sort of scared, though she'd be the last to admit it.

"What do you think of your youngest?" she tried to sound so matter of fact about it to Pa. "He's got a steady girl."

"Al?" Pa chuckled. "He'll have a hundred steady girls before he's ready to settle down." Then suddenly he realized Mom was crying. "Say, what's eating you?" He always sounded so helpless when Mom cried. Maybe it was because she did it so seldom. "No sense turning on the waterworks, just because he's gone daffy over some girl. He wouldn't be a legal Sullivan if he didn't have an eye for the women."

"But Tom, he's only a baby," Mom wailed. "And she's not good enough for him, a little snip like that."

"The Rooff girl?" Pa sounded patient. "I didn't know you knew her."

"I don't," Mom sniffled.

"Well," Pa sighed, "how come then you call her a little snip? She may be a prizewinner."

"Oh!" Mom's tears went in her indignation. "She's . . . she's got you on her side already. Well, she won't take me in with her lip rouge and permanent waves!"

Just the same, Mom really did herself proud for Katherine. She'd been cleaning house ever since breakfast, and no little snip could go around town making remarks about the Sullivan hospitality after the dinner Mom was making. No one could turn a nose up at turkey, could they? Or everything that went with it, right down to crisped celery stalks and salted peanuts. Mom had her back up all right. She was being so stiff and formal Al couldn't conceal his nervousness as he brought Katherine in.

"It was so nice of you to ask me," Katherine said in her soft way.

Even Mom had to admit she was pretty, soft and sort of cuddly looking and dark—and that she used less make-up than Gen even. Still, maybe it was asking too much of her, to unbend all at once.

"It was very nice of you to take pot luck," she said, just as if the turkey was in the same class with leftovers at the House of Sullivan.

But it was funny, Mom thought, how women will stick together, in spite of what people say. For when the boys teased Katherine at dinner that night, secretly resenting Al's being taken away from them almost as much as Mom did, it was Mom who flew to the girl's defense. And it was funny, too, how different things were after that. Why, when the day came Katherine and Al stood at the altar together Mom really felt that she was gaining a daughter instead of losing a son. And by the time she knew the baby was coming—well, Mom would have just liked to see anyone dare to try and say anything against her daughter!

It really hadn't made any difference at all, Al's being married. The boys were as close as ever. Just as close as thieves, Mom used to say proudly. That time Al lost his job, just before the baby was born, and didn't want to upset Katherine by telling her—it was George who borrowed the money to see him through, and the others would have done the same only their credit wasn't as good, them not making as much money. And the night the baby was born and the nurse came out to the waiting room to say everything was wonderful and it was a boy—goodness, she didn't know which one of the five Sullivan boys was the father! They all of them looked so scared.

They were all together that day the awful news about Pearl Harbor came over the radio, too, for Al and his family always spent Sundays at the house. And as they sat listening to the news about what was going on half way around the world, they all thought of the same thing. But it was Gen who put it into words.

"Bill Bascom," she whispered. "The Arizona's out there."

Mom couldn't do a thing but think about Mrs. Bascom and how terrible it was to have a son in Pearl Harbor that day. Why if it was her, she just wouldn't be able to stand it, she thought.

"I'm going to call up that poor Mrs. Bascom," she said, getting to her feet. "She must be half crazy. Her only boy."

When she came back to the living room, the boys were gone. She could hear their voices upstairs and she thought Pa looked funny, as if he'd got older in the ten minutes she'd been away. But she didn't think anything of it until the boys came back and George stood there, trying to say something.

Pa looked up. He'd known what it was all about.

"I guess you'll be enlisting first thing in the morning, eh?" he said. "Which'll it be? Army or Navy?"

"The Navy, Pa," George said.

"Yep." Pop nodded. "That'd be for me, too, if I was younger."

"Al!" Gen said suddenly, asking the question Katherine hadn't dared to ask. "Not you?"

"No," Al said. "I can't go."

Mom felt as if she were struggling through a nightmare. It had been such a beautiful morning for December. She'd felt like singing all the time she was making dinner.

"I think I'll slip over to the church and light a candle for Bill Bascom," she said. "Light a few candles."

"Wait a minute, Mom," Pa said. "I'll go along with you."

"Yeah," George said. "We'll all go."

Al hadn't been able to sleep all night. Katherine knew how he felt, and was being particularly understanding—but it made her heart ache to see his face as he stood there on the porch, holding his lunch box as if it weighed a hundred pounds.

"Here they come," he said, and Katherine felt that stab of fear as she saw the four coming up the street side by side. Al cleared his throat. He managed to grin. "Well," he called, "it took a war to get you loafers out of bed this early. Will they take you right off or will you get to come home first?"

"You got me," Joe grinned. "I never worked for Uncle Sam before."

"Will you write to a guy?" Al asked.

"Sure! You bet!" Frank said. "And you write us all the local dirt."

George came bounding up the steps, taking his small nephew from Katherine's arms. "'Bye old timer," he said. "Be a good boy."

Al's adam's apple seemed to be slipping all up and down his throat.

"Well, don't fall out of any hammocks," he said. "And give me a call after you're sworn in and lemme know what cooks, huh?"

"Sure," Matt said. "Well . . . goodbye now. If he gets out of line, Katherine, you just drop us a postcard and we'll sic the U. S. Navy on him."

"I'll do that," Katherine said in a small voice. She stood there waving until they'd turned the corner. She didn't dare look at Al.

"The fighting Sullivans," he said, and his voice sounded strange. "You know, it's funny. I was always the lightest, but my right cross is the best in the bunch. What a wallop!"

Katherine looked at him. Her heart felt as if it were crying.

"Go on, honey," she said in a quiet voice. And then as he stared at her, "You belong with them. It's always been the five of you."

"Listen," Al said, "I'm a married man, remember? I belong here with you and Jimmy."

"We'll make out," Katherine said. "I want you to go, Al."

"Oh, you do, huh?" Al was trying his best to kid. "Well, that's a fine thing. Tryin' to get rid of your old man!"

"I mean it," Katherine said. "Every day the war lasts you'd be eating your heart out. I couldn't have that. Hurry and catch up with them, sweetheart."

She kissed him, quickly, hard, and only clung to him a second. Then she pushed him away. Al looked like a kid just out of school for the summer.

"Hey, wait!" he shouted. "I'm coming with you."

It took special permission from the Navy Department for the five of them to get on one ship. It was against regulations but George must have shown how strongly they felt in that letter he wrote.

Katherine and the baby moved over to the Sullivan house the morning they were leaving. They were going to have Matt's and Al's old room and Mom was awfully glad they were going to be there. Afterwards she never knew how she got through that morning, but somehow she did. It helped, packing lunch for them, having things to do. And when the time came it was funny how there weren't any different things to say this time than there had been all the other times when they were just going away for the day. Not until just at the very end. And that part was hard.

"Georgie, you're the oldest," Mom said. "Promise you'll take care of them."

"Sure," George grinned. "I'll sing 'em to sleep every night."

"I mean it, now," Mom said. "You promise?"

"I promise," George said.

Al was sticking close to Katherine and the baby, but even he couldn't find anything different to say.

"Mustn't suck your thumb, old timer," he said, taking it firmly out of the baby's mouth. "Mustn't spoil the shape of your mouth. You be a good boy and look after Mama for me."

It was over at last and the boys were gone. The months of waiting had begun. There were the times when nothing happened. There were the wonderful times when letters came.

Mom was washing that morning someone telephoned and said a man from the Navy was coming to see them. It was a puny wash, hardly worth wetting the tub for, Mom thought, wishing for those full clotheslines she used to hang out.

"The Navy fellow'd better hurry on over here," Pa said. "I haven't been late in . . ."

"I know," Mom grinned. "In thirty-three years."

She thought maybe it was a friend of the boys who was coming and that if he were on leave maybe he'd like to stay with them. There was enough room now, goodness knew. But when he came she sort of hesitated. He was a chief petty officer and he looked so sort of serious. But she did ask him if he didn't want a cup of coffee.

"No, thank you," he said. He looked so uncomfortable, clearing his throat like that. "I'm afraid I'm bringing you very bad news," he said, go-

HUNCHES THEY CAN'T EXPLAIN

If you lose something, Geraldine Fitzgerald can "see" its hiding place; how or why heaven knows—for Geraldine certainly doesn't.

The first time Geraldine exercised this uncanny power, she was in a punt on the Thames. A party of girls and young men were headed for a shady cove and a picnic lunch, when one of the girls missed a pearl ring. She thought it had fallen into the water.

"No," Geraldine heard herself saying, as much to her own surprise as anybody's, "it isn't in the river." She couldn't "see" it there. "It's back at the inn someplace." When the crowd returned to the inn, Geraldine walked into the girl's room, concentrated a moment, and said, "It slipped off while you were at the dressing table. It's behind that box."

By heck, it was.

Another time, Geraldine proved that she could "see" as easily for a stranger as for a friend. She was taken to tea at a stranger's house, where the hostess complained about the disappearance of a valuable necklace, an heirloom. People had begun to hear about Geraldine's gift of second sight, and an acquaintance remarked sarcastically, "Oh, Gerry will find it for you!"

Rather miffed, Geraldine accepted the challenge. She nodded toward a basket of artificial fruit on a side table. "It's there," she announced. Again, it was. Apparently the necklace had dropped off as the hostess was arranging the basket.

Whether or not her gift is a species of mind reading Geraldine isn't sure. But in any case, since she can find lost objects with such accuracy, Gerry ought to be invaluable to the FBI.

ing on as if he wanted to put off the thing he'd come to say as long as possible. Mom heard the baby laugh upstairs, where Katherine was giving him his bath. It was funny the way she kept listening to Jimmy and the Navy man at the same time. "You see," he went on. "The way they do things ordinarily, why you'd get a telegram right from the Navy department. But because . . ."

Pa looked at him, straight in the eye.

"The lot of them?" he asked huskily. "All five?"

"Yes, sir," the man said. "The report says your son George was confined to the sick bay and the others went down trying to find him, when the order came to abandon ship. There wasn't time. The explosion . . ."

Gen gave a strangled scream and Mom went over to her.

"Hush, darlin'," she said. "Crying won't bring 'em back."

She knew she had something to do, but for a moment she couldn't think what it was. As she passed Pa he reached out for her hand and held it, resting his head against her heavy, strong body. Pa was crying, too.

"I know, I know," she said gently. Suddenly she remembered what it was she had to do and pulled herself away from him. "I gotta break it to Katherine, darlin'," she explained.

But before she got to the door Katherine came running down the stairs.

"Mama, what happened?" she asked. "I hear Gen crying. Is it . . . ?"

Mom opened her arms and she ran into them. They rocked together for a moment.

"Al?" Katherine whispered at last, forcing the word out.

"All of them, my dear," Mom said.

She hadn't been able to cry that day. But Mom was crying now. It was funny how comforting tears got after a while, how they seemed to wash away that tight, hard ache in the heart. Suddenly she sat up and tipped her hat straight. Mercy, her thoughts had been wandering so she'd missed a lot of what the Admiral was saying. And she'd promised Katherine to remember every single word of it, too.

He was saying something about Gen's joining the Waves, and the tears fled in the proud smile that came as Mom looked at her daughter. She looked so pretty in her uniform. The Waves' outfit was so much more becoming somehow than the Wacs, Mom thought.

Then suddenly the Admiral beckoned to her and there she was, standing right beside him. The band began playing and workmen were hurriedly knocking out the blocks holding the huge destroyer on the ways. Somebody gave her a champagne bottle and she held it firmly.

The blocks were all released now. She looked up at the ship and suddenly she discovered she could smile.

"I christen thee U. S. S. Sullivan," she said, and her voice rang out clearly, proudly, as she smashed the bottle against the prow.

It was almost like seeing a ship come to life, the way it quivered and then began sliding, slowly at first, then faster until it floated out into the bay. Never had a ship been so beautiful as that one.

"Tom," Mom said, holding tight to Pa's hand. "Our boys are afloat again!"

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND

I'D LIKE TO . . .
- Know how to build a fire with two sticks, boy scout fashion;
- Shine in emergencies;
- Catch up on all the good books I've missed;
- Write a book—but I know I never will.

ONCE I THOUGHT . . .

It mattered what people say. I suffered dreadfully over what I thought was said about me. Now I know I am my own best judge, must make my own decisions, and "What-will-people-say" is no longer a bogie.

I BELIEVE . . .

In luck. I've been very lucky at times.

In a sixth sense. I frequently know things without understanding how I know them. One Sunday as I drove with friends to an engagement, I suddenly said: "Please stop at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel. There will be a cable for me." I had no idea what made me say that. We stopped, found no cable, but an hour later the cable arrived.

I LIKE . . .
- To sleep soundly, because I love to get up refreshed and ready to go;
- Square plates, freesias, General Montgomery and his beret, or General Montgomery without his beret; little scampering mice, onions, and curious and interesting foods;
- The idea of promptness. I believe in it, but I never am.

I DISLIKE . . .
- Crowds;
- People who sniffle;
- Poke bonnets;
- Unexplained thumps in a house at night.

I'M NEVER ANNOYED WITH . . .

People who want me to try their cold remedies. I usually have several to offer myself.

I THINK IT'S FUN TO . . .
- Plan parties, work out every detail of decoration, menu and entertainment;
- Outwit the traffic cop when the signal turns red just as I reach it. . . . My system is to go halfway through the intersection, start to back up, look helplessly around as if to say: "Oh dear, I'd better go on!" and then dart through.

I'VE LEARNED . . .

Practically everything by the trial and error method. I learn from my mistakes. I'm not sorry to make them—I'm glad I can learn that way—but I'm seriously annoyed with myself when I repeat a mistake.

WHEN I WAS AT SCHOOL . . .

I wanted to look like a Palm Olive advertisement I cut out of a magazine. The girl in the picture had very black hair, brown eyes and a sweet, sweet, sweet smile. When I came on the ad years later, was I glad all dreams don't come true!

I'LL NEVER FORGET . . .

A coat my mother gave me one Christmas. It was gray with a red tie and had a printed pattern in red and black and gray. When I returned to school wearing it, it struck the other children as very funny. They called it my "bathrobe," shrieked with mirth and made me acutely miserable.

A meal at the Lakeside Golf Club. I gained twenty pounds after my operation and was warned not to take it off until I was quite recovered. I played in period pictures where weight was no problem, but along came a modern picture and I had to reduce—but fast. I went on the Harper's Bazaar diet, where you eat steaks, chops and tomato salad, no more. Today I'm probably the only creature in America who doesn't mind the meat shortage.

I craved all the foods I couldn't have and looked forward to Fridays because that was the day I was permitted one piece of French toast.

Our director used to take us to the Golf Club for lunch, and while I toyed with a slice of tomato the rest of the company devoured delectable dishes.

One day I came to the end of my self-control, ate every single item on the buffet.

Next day they couldn't shoot the picture—I was home in bed.

The beautiful thing a little girl did for me.

Her name was Helen Burns. She and I were six.

Our school house had a huge standpipe that filled up when it rained and overflowed like a geyser, dramatically.

The great sport at school was to stand under the geyser and enjoy the shock and excitement of water splashing down three stories upon you.

One day Helen and I, greatly daring, stood under the geyser. My mother saw me, yanked me home, gave me a good spanking and sent me back to school—not in a dress like all the other little girls, but in the khaki blouse and pants I wore for play.

I suffered horribly at having to appear different from all my schoolmates. It was simply excruciating.

Helen saw me, ran home and put on her khaki outfit, came back and sat beside me.

I thought her wonderful. I still do.

I'D HATE . . .

To live any day of my life over again.

I liked some days very much indeed — some were unbelievably perfect—but I've had them.

THE FIRST THING THAT ATTRACTS ME . . .

IN a man is brains, humor, kindness, honesty and courage—yes, and vitality. Intelligence and humor are probably the first things I notice; the existence of the other qualities isn't so immediately apparent.

In a woman is charm. Often very dumb women have it, but it attracts me. I like intelligent women, of course. It's nice to have women friends, but they are more difficult to acquire than men friends—at least for me.

I ENJOY . . .

Almost any kind of music—melodies, tangos, rhumbas, songs from "Oklahoma," so-called classical music.

Pictures—but I don't know a great deal about them. I spent a glorious afternoon this week looking at a collection belonging to a friend and I hope I'll never forget it. He had three Rousseaus, some Paul Klees, several Picassos; some lovely, lovely things!

Books, but I'm usually from one to fifty years late in reading what everyone else reads. I've just caught up with "South Wind," "Moby Dick," Wells' "Outline of History," F. Scott Fitzgerald and Ibsen's plays.

I ADORE . . .

Storms,

Torrential rains;

Thunder and lightning. They make me feel safe, oddly enough.

My first and only pet, my Airedale Shadrack, in spite of his arrogance, wilfulness, unreasonable ideas about discipline.

Older men.

I'M GUILTY OF . . .

Postponing decisions. But it's usually because something tells me to wait—and I wait.

Spoiling people I love. But maybe it's just that I like to make them happy.

Trying too hard for perfection. Or just trying too hard. Period.

SOME DAY I WOULD LIKE . . .

To have a baby. I'd like two or three, but I do want to be sure of one.

But—

I'M NOT FOND OF . . .

All babies and small children. I never know how to handle them.

I WANT TO . . .

Know the truth about people.

Once you know their virtues and their faults, their ideas, hopes and beliefs, you know what to do about them. It's not easy, but if you're fond of anyone it's your business to find out the whole truth.

I BELIEVE IN . . .

Destiny and free will.

It seems to me that we each have a pattern we are to follow in life. But we also have a thread of free will that we can use as we please. It is up to us to weave the thread into the pattern.

Whatever we do with our lives, some of the praise and some of the blame is certainly all our own.

ONE DAY SOON, you will be asked to lend your Government at least an extra $100. To put at least an extra $100, over your regular Bond buying, into War Bonds for the 4th War Loan.

Don't—don't say you can't afford it even though you may wonder how you're going to get that money.

If you think that getting the money is going to be hard, why, before the doorbell rings, look at the faces of these dead countrymen of yours. Read their stories.

Then think how hard it would be to have to tell Americans like these that other Americans can't afford to lend at least an extra $100!

JAMES CAGNEY

walked to her husband. She kissed him and said, "You were very good tonight, George."

But in the days when the Cagneys viewed shows from the gallery, life was still precarious. Once when his last show had only lasted eight weeks and the waits between engagements were getting longer, Jimmy decided to call it quits and go back to being a song and dance man in vaudeville. He worked up an act with Joan Blondell, who had played opposite him in the last play.

Billie was disturbed. She felt that both Jimmy and Joan, who had also graduated from vaudeville, were taking a step backwards. But for once she was wrong. Jimmy and Joan started out on the act, and a week later they both made screen tests.

With success Billie and Jimmy found themselves with the problem of readjusting their lives. Billie had heard how frequently Hollywood success killed happy marriages, and she did not want this to happen to hers.

Whereupon she made some firm resolutions, by which she still abides. She decided to stay absolutely in the background and not interfere in Jimmy's career in any way. She would run a perfect home and be the perfect wife, in so far as it was humanly possible. To this day, if anyone comes to the house to see Jimmy on business, Billie quickly disappears to the victory garden or goes shopping. She would avoid publicity and never went to the studio unless Jimmy invited her.

Another resolution she made was never to touch Jimmy's clothes. Once in a fit of prosperity she gave away some of his old clothes. Jimmy let out a yell. He liked old clothes—they were like old friends—comfortable. He's still that way. Billie would like him all slicked up, but he still wears old clothes. He even has them patched when he wears them thin.

Another problem success brought was that now they had little time for friends, and privacy was a thing of the past. When Jimmy was not making a picture, he made personal appearances and did all sorts of interviews. There was slight time for private affairs. Billie saw this was getting under Jimmy's skin, and it worried her. Then suddenly she remembered Jimmy's early longing for a farm. The night she reminded Jimmy of this dream, they went AWOL from Hollywood. They interviewed a hundred real estate agents. They saw a thousand places. They turned down palaces and "gentleman's estates" by the score. They knew what they wanted—a simple, old fashioned place where they could be alone and at peace. They discovered the perfect farm at Martha's Vineyard, that pretty little island just off the coast of Massachusetts, green and quiet and definitely hard for fans to reach.

Here all by themselves they found happiness in a small farm house, heated by coal stoves. Billie did all the housework and cooking. Jimmy went in for gardening. Billie thought at last they again had privacy. Unfortunately, she forgot to figure on the public.

One day, dressed in a bungalow apron and her hair tied in a knot on her head (hardly a creation for company) she went to the woodshed to get some wood for the stove. When she came out, she was amazed to find a group of people on the premises to get a glimpse of her and Jimmy and take snapshots. An enterprising bus driver had brought his passengers sightseeing.

After that, they learned to be prepared for anything. On the second vacation they spent at the farm, Billie noticed Jimmy disappeared right after breakfast each morning. Investigating, she discovered he was spending his time with an old gentleman who trained horses for sulky racing. Now Jimmy has learned to race, and it has become his principal hobby.

Recently Jimmy did some sulky racing in connection with selling war bonds. He lost a race and called Billie long distance to tell her about it. Over and over he assured her he did not mind losing the race—but he was beaten by a woman! From now on, racing with women was out!

It was not until four years ago that Jimmy and Billie built in Hollywood the house they had dreamed about when they were in the chorus of "Pitter Patter." But they still carried out their plan of a New England house to the smallest detail.

The home is small but extremely comfortable. Downstairs is a large living room with a grand piano at which Jimmy composes the tunes that amuse him. Directly off the living room is Jimmy's den. Here Billie and Jimmy love to spend an evening reading and listening to the radio. They both think Frances Langford is the best singer on the air and they never miss "Duffy's Tavern."

The dining room and kitchen complete the lower part of the house—and the upper story is completely divided into two bedrooms with dressing rooms. Jimmy's is strictly New England, even to the marble top bureau. Billie's room is furnished entirely in white, and her dressing table is crowded with all sorts of perfumes.

They have an agreement that the inside of the house is Billie's and the outside Jimmy's. Liking to work outdoors Jimmy made four victory gardens, built chicken coops and a duck pond. There is a swimming pool for the ducks, but none for the Cagneys.

Having furnished the home they always wanted, Billie and Jimmy settled down to enjoy it. They would entertain their old friends, the Pat O'Briens and the Frank McHughs—and once a week there would be a gathering of the Cagney Clan. They did just that. It was delightful, but somehow their life did not seem to be complete. They both felt that a house could never be a home without children. So they found a little boy and girl to share their good fortune with them. Jimmy Jr. and Casey.

The adoption of children presented a new problem. They had not considered children when they planned the house. At first they decided to build a new wing, but it occurred to Jimmy that the irregular hours he kept when making a picture would interfere with the children's routine. So they decided to build the children a house of their own directly in back of the main house. It is like a grown up doll house and consists of a kitchen, living room, and two bedrooms. Behind the little house is a combination playhouse and gymnasium.

Jimmy had two miniature director's chairs made with Jimmy Jr.'s name printed in black letters on one and Casey's on the other. These stand in front of the fireplace in the living room of the big house.

"It's to make the children feel they are really the heads of this outfit," Jimmy explains.

Casey's and Jimmy Jr's biggest delight is being allowed to visit the studio when their father is working in a picture. And they are given this privilege whenever action and not dialogue is being shot. Their parents take no chances of having them talk and ruin a perfect take. Next to going to the studio the children love to watch Jimmy practice dancing.

When he was learning the routine he did on the stairs of the White House in "Yankee Doodle Dandy," he practiced on the wide stairway in their home. Not till little Jimmy and Casey howled with glee did big Jim think it perfect.

All in all, twenty years ago a rainy night brought Billie and Jimmy health, wealth, and happiness. And may it continue to be that way for the rest of their lives.

THE END

Bob Hope obviously approves of Marine Corps Women Reserves, especially the two we see here, who are visiting him prior to a recent broadcast from the Marine Corps base at San Diega.

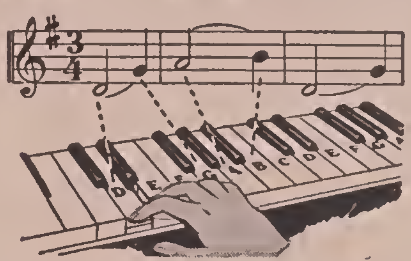
To those who think
LEARNING MUSIC is hard . .

Just strike these notes and you're playing the beginning of the "Merry Widow" Waltz



Look at the diagram. The first note of the music is "D". Following the dotted line to the keyboard you'll find "D" is the white key between the two black keys near the middle of the keyboard. Now read below how you can learn to play any instrument quickly and easily.

Easy as A-B-C—COSTS LESS than 7c a day!

● Perhaps you think learning music is a tedious grind. It isn't any longer! Long hours of practicing scales and monotonous exercises are over.

You have no excuses for not getting started toward musical good times now! For through an easy method you can now learn to play right at home—without a teacher—for less than 7c a day.

Learn to Play by Playing

The lessons come to you by mail from the famous U. S. School of Music . . . complete instructions, clear diagrams and all the music you need. You learn to play by playing real tunes by note. First you are told how to do a thing. Then a picture shows you how. Then you do it yourself and hear it. Remember, don't confuse our method with any system claiming to teach music "by ear" or by trick methods. We teach you to play only from real notes!

SUCCESS!
Here's what one of our thousands of pupils writes: "I learned more from your course than many of my friends who studied under private teachers have for years. The fact that I've already taken 2 courses and am now enrolling for a third should speak for itself." F. A. S., Indiana.

FREE! Print and Picture Sample. Our illustrated Free Booklet and "Print and Picture" Sample fully explain this remarkable course. So decide which instrument you want to play and mail the coupon today. U. S. School of Music, 1583 Brunswick Bldg., New York 10, N. Y.

Letter to a P.O.W.

WILL YOU WRITE a letter to a Prisoner of War . . . tonight?

Perhaps he was left behind when Bataan fell. Perhaps he had to bail out over Germany. Anyway, he's an American, and he hasn't had a letter in a long, long time.

And when you sit down to write, tell him why you didn't buy your share of War Bonds last pay day—if you didn't.

"Dear Joe," you might say, "the old topcoat was getting kind of threadbare, so I . . ."

No, cross it out. Joe might not understand about the topcoat, especially if he's shivering in a damp Japanese cell.

Let's try again. "Dear Joe, I've been working pretty hard and haven't had a vacation in over a year, so . . ."

Better cross that out, too. They don't ever get vacations where Joe's staying.

Well, what are you waiting for? Go ahead, write the letter to Joe. Try to write it, anyhow.

But mister, or madam, or miss, if somehow you find you can't finish that letter, will you, at least, do this for Joe? Will you up the amount of money you're putting into your Payroll Savings Plan—so that you'll be buying your share of War Bonds from here on in? And will you—for Joe's sake—start doing it right away?

Their Favorite Tunes

When Janet Blair was a youngster of thirteen, she dreamed of being a great singer. The manager of Hal Kemp's band was a friend of the family's and told her, half in jest, that if she studied hard, perhaps some day she would sing with Kemp's band. That day came, five years later. Kemp's band was playing at a dance in Altoona. They'd just finished "How Strange, My Love." Janet sought out the manager, reminded him of his promise, and said, "I'd like to try out for the job now. I like that song, 'How Strange, My Love.' May I sing it for you?" In her strange, throbbing voice, she sang. And her singing of "How Strange, My Love" had won her the job. She was started on the career that eventually led to today's star-ranking success.

humor, and a bad humor affects her good luck.

John Garfield doesn't know if it's just a matter of his being lazy or superstitious. But one thing he does know, if he puts some of his clothes on wrong side out, he leaves them that way all day long.

Frank Sinatra has made his bed and he is perfectly willing to lie on it, but no hats, thank you, on that bed. A hat on a bed is bad luck. He's not tempting fate.

Susan Hayward has furnished quite a few homes. When she completely furnishes them, terrible things happen. Now she sleeps in a bedroom with only one piece of furniture in it—the bed, no less—and no more. And her luck has changed as if by a miracle. May be lucky for Susan, but not so good for the decorator.

Jinx Falkenburg seriously avows she isn't superstitious. However, she wears a piece of costume jewelry which spells out her name JINX on everything she dons from dawn to dusk.

Gloria Jean knew most men liked to play poker. So she sent several boxes of poker chips to some of the boys overseas. About four months ago Gloria received a letter from a Marine, enclosing a broken chip. In the letter he told Gloria that the chip had stopped a bullet and saved his life. Since then, Gloria has sent many more boxes of chips overseas because she is superstitious about their bringing good luck.

Greer Garson doesn't believe in luck, but she always keeps near her a black fitted case and a jade green dressing gown that were given to her by her associates when she left the advertising firm for which she worked in England to join the Birmingham Repertory Theater. Could it be that she's so sentimental?

Nancy Coleman, on entering a room, always completes a circle before she leaves it. This might make some girls dizzy, but it makes Nancy lucky. Or so she thinks.

Maria Montez wouldn't think of starting her daily activities without first reading what the stars have in store for her.

Alice Faye ("Gang's All Here" is her latest picture for 20th Century-Fox) isn't frankly superstitious, but she doesn't take chances.

The Big Studio has made a very special issue of the best-seller G. I. story!

Robert Walker whose own private life reads like a composite biography of the average private, plays the title role!

Walker worked in a garage, punched cattle in Texas, jerked sodas on Broadway, survived a wreck at sea, then turned to the film-world for more excitement.

He made his bow to picture-audiences as the sailor-boy in "Bataan"—followed this with a role in "Madame Curie". His checkered past partly accounts for his splendid performance as the naive rookie.

"See Here, Private Hargrove" should be seen. It's definitely in the nature of a command performance for every sweetheart, wife, mother, dad and kid brother.

HAND-PICKED Talent

BY SHIRLEY COOK
Beauty Editor

EVERY so often, a famous director looks at a young player and says "That's star material!" Luck, you think? Well, it is good fortune, but it's something more than luck. Talent with such promise is hand-picked and carefully cultivated.

Take June Allyson who acts, sings, dances—and looks lovely. With just four Hollywood appearances to her credit, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has already placed her in the enviable leading role of "Two Sisters and a Sailor."

I talked to June recently during a brief "time-out" in her New York dressing room and it's easy to see why. Her busy working schedule left little time for leisure. Yet there June sat, relaxing between shows—repairing her nail polish! It's this make-the-most-of-every-minute attitude that marks the difference between "pretty girl" and "potential star."

June uses her hands fluently, gracefully, to accent a word or complete a dance routine. Because they play an active part in her vivacious personality, she keeps them smooth and white, tipped with sparkling, colorful nails.

This doesn't mean a few quick trips to the studio manicurist. It means consistent daily care. Wherever June goes—her hand and nail helps go with her.

Hand lotion is standard equipment in every dressing room. But just to be sure, June tucks a smaller bottle in her purse where it's always handy for after-washing massage.

To help the softening and whitening process, she makes her face cream do double duty. All excess cleanser and emollient is rubbed into fingertips, around cuticles and across the thin-skinned backs of her hands.

According to June, cuticle care is entirely preventive. Instead of encouraging hangnails with scissor-snipping, she curbs her cuticles by pushing them back every time she dries her hands; by grooming them several times a week with an orangewood stick dipped in cuticle remover; and by frequent applications of cuticle oil or nail cream.

Such attention helps to promote strong healthy nails. Because June is justly proud of hers, she paints them prettily with brilliant nail lacquer. Frequent changes of costume often suggest harmonizing polish preferences. But June knows that she can preserve her polish for a week at a time if she uses two coats over a foundation and under a sealing topcoat. Daily applications of the colorless sealer help to control chipping.

With so much good and gentle care, accidents rarely occur. When they do—June is ready for them.

For a nail that tears at the corner or cracks at one side, there is special nail-mending cement. Mender is spread over the polish-free nail, reinforced with tissue and lacquered to look as good as new. In case of complete catastrophe—where a nail breaks right off—an artificial one can take its place. No one will ever know.

As you can see, June holds success in hands that look as if they were made for it. That's not good luck either—it's good care.

Dashing for a date? Do as June does. Protect soft hands with silky lotion.

SOMETHING NEW HAS BEEN ADDED!

Happiest couple in town right now: Mr. and Mrs. Ronald Colman. Reason is that after five years of most happy marriage, there's a baby expected. Both Ronnie and Benita are much too British and dignified to discuss this blessed event very much, but the glow on the faces tells plenty.

Ronnie never had any children in his former, long-time and wretchedly unhappy marriage. He had been separated from his former wife for some dozen years when he met Benita Hume. Since this marriage, he has not been the bookish recluse whom Hollywood had known so long.. Instead, he is a definitely happy, delightful person. Since 1939 both he and his wife have given up every free moment to various British war relief activities.

It ought to be the prettiest baby since Joan Bennett and Walter Wanger's daughter was born.

Only professional women writers who write exclusively of Hollywood can be members. The only other rule we have is that Hollywood stars can't be guest speakers. had every important war correspondent, famous military figures, Washington big shots and the like, and it's all mighty fine.

The reason we decided against stars as speakers was because that savored too much of our daily work, and because we felt stars might feel under pressure on those conditions, too. But once a year, at Christmas time, we have a jamboree. We vote on the most cooperative actor and actress of the year, as regards their relationship to the press, and the least cooperative male and female, too.

This year Ann Sheridan and Bob Hope won the awards as the most cooperative stars, Joan Fontaine and Errol Flynn getting our booby prize. Personally I didn't agree on the award to Fontaine. I have always felt she was a girl who got herself easily misunderstood, but in my own relationships with her I've always found her intelligent, witty and most friendly. As for Errol, he is definitely uncooperative, won't pose for any publicity pictures, won't give interviews, won't do a doggone thing—but is so charming about it that it is still difficult to get annoyed with him.

But when it comes to the cooperative stars, what bliss! Without exception, we all love Annie Sheridan. And as for that Hope guy! Well, we also gave him our award in 1941, which certainly proves how we feel about him.

At our holiday party, when I gave out the awards (as you can see on the page before this), we had a wonderful time. Cary Grant, in white cotton whiskers, came along to act as Santa Claus for all of us. (Cary won the cooperative award last year and has insisted ever since on being our only male club member.) Lucille Ball, who ran only one vote behind Annie, joined us, too. And the ribbing that went on around the table was strictly rare.

FOR THE HOUSING SHORTAGE

Archie Gardner (of "Duffy's Tavern") and his wife came to Hollywood a few months ago. They couldn't find a small house. No hotel would have them for more than two weeks, so they finally rented a great mansion in Bel-Air and were so proud of it they invited half the town each week-end to see their prize.

When they finally had to move east again, this is the ad they placed in the Hollywood Reporter, motion picture trade paper. "HOUSE FOR RENT. On account

SONG OF RUSSIA (MGM) marks Robert Taylor's farewell to Hollywood for the duration. In his final film, Bob plays an American symphony conductor on tour of the Soviet just a few months before the Nazi invasion began. He meets and marries a Russian peasant girl, winsomely enacted by Susan Peters. Their charming romance dominates a large share of the picture until the German threat brings about an enforced separation. He is continuing his tour when he learns that her village, to which she has returned, is directly in the path of the invading Nazi. At intimate first hand, the American gains knowledge of Stalin's scorched-earth policy. The conviction some of these latter scenes pack owes much to the direction by Russian Gregory Ratoff, and the imposing music of Tschaikowsky and other native composers attains magnificent values as conducted by Dr. Albert Coates.

Upon the high notes of "Song of Russia," Taylor suspends his screen career until victory, and his performance is a fine thing by which to remember him. Also unforgettable is the brilliant work of the appealing Susan Peters. It was originally intended to bring the story to a tragic climax by depicting her death. A happier but not quite so satisfactory an ending now sends the girl back to America with her husband charged by her village leader with informing us of the spirit with which Russia fights. John Hodiak is this village leader, and there are other important roles for Robert Benchley, Felix Bressart and little Darryl Hickman.

MOONLIGHT IN VERMONT (Universal) has the studio's Jivin' Jacks and Jills off on another jaunt to aid in the civilian war effort. The last time they got loose, they went into split-shifts in an aviation factory. Now they're off to help with the harvesting as volunteer farm workers, a worthy but far from adeptly presented notion. Even Gloria Jean can't save the heavy corn crop from those Jivin kids. Skip it.

STANDING ROOM ONLY (Paramount) describes again and most amusingly the overcrowded conditions of war-time Washington. It is very funny romantic nonsense involving Fred MacMurray and Paulette Goddard, with Edward Arnold, Roland Young and Anne Revere in it to help out with the farcical gaiety. Not much of the Washington scene escapes a good-natured ribbing, all accomplished without stepping on the toes of "The More the Merrier," which you doubtless remember hugely enjoying last summer. This is another must-see entry for your Laugh Parade.

A toy manufacturer and his secretary arrive in Washington on business with the government. (Never mind what business: it quickly turns into monkeyshines.) One rainy night spent in a park is enough to convince Paulette that something must be done—but immediately—about the proverbial roof overhead. She has no other recourse in the situation except to hire herself out as a maid and Fred as a butler in the household of Roland Young. And if this isn't enough of the plot to make you want to see "Standing Room Only," you don't deserve to.

GUIDE

[FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH ON PAGE 58]

JEANNIE (English Films, Inc.) proves that the English can be charmingly engaging when indulging a sense of humor for which Americans do not always give them credit. "Jeannie" is one of the most enjoyable fresh comedies of the year, a naive Cinderella story of pre-war vintage which tells how an underprivileged girl "splurged" her small inheritance of a few hundred pounds on a whirlwind trip to romantic Vienna. She just wanted to hear "The Blue Danube Waltz" played at "the source."

Barbara Mullen's completely unorthodox performance of the title role is a to-be-treasured gem. She alone is reason enough to seek out the film, only a couple of prints of which have reached the States. See one if you possibly can.

ALI BABA AND THE FORTY THIEVES (Universal) takes all of us on an Arabian Nights magic carpet back to the 13th Century to reacquaint ourselves with a fable we have known since childhood. The picture is spectacularly filmed in Technicolor, as well it had the right to be. Co-starred are the easy-to-look-at Maria Montez, the stalwart Jon Hall, and Turhan Bey, substituting for Sabu who is now training in the Army Air Corps where he is learning to fly mechanized magic carpets.

Nor does the Open, O Seasame fable of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" entirely escape modernization by implications. Through the duplicity of a Quisling, the evil Mongol Khan seizes Baghdad from the true Caliph, and although his minions are armed with scimitars and sabers, his oppressive tyrannies have close parallel with those practiced by present-day military tyrants. Then there is an uprising of the people sparked by Ali and his Robin Hoodish band of Forty Thieves, and the damsel is no longer in distress. For the single price of admission, the extremely photogenic Miss Montez luxuriates in her bath not once, but twice.

WORDS of MUSIC

by JILL WARREN

Hi, People! Spring weather, those post-income tax blues and lots of business in the music shop. They all get me. And in addition, much mail—which I've been receiving, which you've been writing, which I like. So keep it up, but don't forget to slide in the self-addressed stamped envelope. Some of you kids have forgotten even to put your address in your letter, so I haven't known where to answer you. So let's watch it. And if you have any little questions on your musical favorites, just send them to Jill Warren, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California. Here come the customers, so here I go . . .

THE TUNEFILMS:

Twentieth Century-Fox is really excited over Dick Haymes. He did so well in "Four Jills and a Jeep" that they have signed him on a long term contract and are going to co-star him with Vivian Blaine in "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling," which will be one of their big 1944 musicals. Vivian is an ex-band vocalist, who got a terrific break when she was assigned Alice Faye's part in "Greenwich Village."

The title of Benny Goodman's next picture for Fox has been changed from "Moment For Music" to "Sweet and Low Down" and they promise that the film will be an authentic story of a band and its musicians. It's high time Hollywood got on with it and made a really true picture about our favorite people, so let's hope that this will be it. I'm so weary of movie moguls taking name bands and completely mishandling them on the screen, as they did with Woody Herman in "Wintertime" . . . The best thing about Columbia's "Cover Girl," which stars Rita Hayworth, is a great score by Jerome Kern and Ira Gershwin. Gene Kelly plays opposite Rita, plus supporters like Leslie Brooks and Phil Silvers. One of the big numbers is "The Girl On The Cover," which features all those beautiful cover girls you've read so much about.

Universal has been singularly successful with its musical shorts series featuring name bands and singers. Personally, I always enjoy these rhythmic briefies because they aren't cluttered up with a plot or a love story and the bands just play and the singers just sing. The newest release, and one of the best, is the Teddy Powell short. It spotlights, besides the Powell organization, Ray Eberle, Martha Tilton and the Pied Pipers. Watch for it.

Out at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer the the other day I saw a test of a girl named Marion Bell. Remember her name, because you're going to hear a lot about her. She has a sensational voice, soprano in type, plus the fact that she is beautiful to look at. She'll be a zingy addition to any screen musical. . . . Paramount has signed Les Brown and his orchestra to appear in "Bring On The Girls," in which he'll share honors with Veronica Lake and Sonny Tufts. . . . Republic Studios is planning a big thing called "Jamboree" and they have nabbed the original king of corn, Freddie Fisher and his Schnickelfritz band, for part of the proceedings. Incidentally, Freddie, who made his name and fortune playing la musique de la corne, now raises the real McCoy on his ranch in the San Fernando valley.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

If Academy awards were given for records, I'm sure Decca would get a big one for their new album of the score from "The Song of Bernadette." Alfred Newman, who composed the great music for the picture, has recorded it exactly as you heard it in the film, with the same studio orchestra and female chorus of thirty voices. There are eight sides, and after you've heard them, I think you'll agree with me that the album is one you'll treasure. . . . Just listen to the records and see if I'm not right.

"No Love, No Nothin'" and "Journey To A Star," the two hit tunes from "The Gang's All Here," serve as excellent material for Judy Garland's latest Decca release. The arrangements were made by Calvin Jackson with Georgie Stoll conducting the orchestra. I particularly like the way Judy does "No Love." It's the first time I've heard the song done at the right tempo. Most singers either do it too fast or too slow. If you're a Garland fan, don't forget her "Girl Crazy" album, which I told you about last month. . . . It's really worth looking into. . . . Since

WARREN'S ACADEMY WINNERS FOR 1943

BEST BAND—Charlie Spivak

Because he made such great strides during 1943, and because he does jump tunes equally as well as ballads. Also because I feel that his band as a unit is the best in the country.

BEST FEMALE VOCALIST—Helen Forrest

Because she constantly gets better, and because she was the outstanding girl soloist to go from a band and out on her own during 1943.

BEST MALE VOCALIST—Bing Crosby

Because he is still the master. He just goes on and on.

BEST SONG—"People Will Say We're In Love"

Because it had the most general appeal of any song published during 1943.

What's that? All right, I'll go quietly.

Flash HIT

Lon McAllister, the very young, hitherto-unknown hit of "Stage Door Canteen," is being allowed to get one more picture finished before donning uniform. It's Twentieth Century-Fox's superduper, "Home in Indiana," in which he is virtually a star. The vital statistics on Lon are that he lives with his mother and grandparents at Malibu beach, swims daily. He has dark hair, very blue eyes, dates girls constantly but has never yet been in love.

THE OFF-SCREEN GAGS OF CROSBY AND HOPE

Bing and Bob are a riot in pictures—but they are even funnier on the set when their pictures are shooting

The Crosby humor is subtle and sly. He's funniest when the joke's on his friend and golfing partner, Bob Hope.

An on-set shot showing Bing and Bob doing an act for a honky-tonk scene.

IF YOU are like some hundred million others, you think Bing Crosby and Bob Hope are two very funny screen comedians. Brothers and Sisters, you ain't seen nothing, until you see these two in action off the screen! That's where the laughter flies.

Comedy is usually funny to everyone except comedians. As a class, comedians are an embittered and jealous lot. All save Crosby and Hope, that is. They've made three co-starring pictures and are currently embarked on their fourth. They are actually terrific friends, even if they will do anything to "top" one another.

But what really delights Hollywood is the battle of the witticisms which has developed between the pair on the sets of the "Road" sprees. They can beat anything any scenaric writer can think up. As good as their on-screen comedy is, their off-screen comedy is better. Everything goes, with no holds barred. If Bing puts one over on Bob, his day is complete. If Hope tops Bing his grin threatens his ears. Yet they never lose their tempers and seemingly are as happy to take a verbal lacing as to dish it out.

There's the story they tell on dark nights on the lot, when the wind whistles around Paramount's emptied sound stages, of events which transpired on the day that "Road To Utopia" was launched. Bob had done a radio show at some distant Army camp the night before, was consequently late in reporting. It has become traditional that neither, given the same hour to report, arrives on the set ahead of the other.

As a result, Bing sent a message to Director Hal Walker explaining that Dorothy Lamour would substitute for both. When they did reach the set, Walker asked Hope whom he had entertained the night before. "A bunch of Waves," Bob replied. "And I couldn't get a date with any of them."

The Hope humor is fast and loud. He doesn't need a gag writer—just give him a chance to crack wise at Crosby.

BY JACKSON TIMOTHY

"Why not?" quipped Crosby. "They're only there for basic training."

It was then that Dottie tried to get in a word—and she should have known better. Bob and Bing would sooner break up Dorothy than top each other. For instance, Bob was doing a love scene with Dottie. She had been holding out bravely in the face of flip quips and caustic remarks, but Hope eventually broke her down by saying, "Why should I do a love scene with you? You always work with animals!" Then adding a seeming afterthought, "By the way, the chimpanzee which did a scene with you in 'Aloma of the South Seas' hasn't worked a day since."

The comedians are never happier than when Dottie's husband, Capt. William Ross Howard, III, visits his wife on the set. He had his first experience with the zanies the second week of shooting "Utopia." Bob and Bing went into a huddle on the sidelines. Then Bob said in a stagewhisper which sounded more like an anti-tank gun:

"Who's that man she's with today?"

"Why," replied Bing, just as audibly, "that's her husband."

"Huh!" huhhed Hope. "Must be a publicity stunt."

Dorothy swears that the only reason the two play golf together is to figure out means of pulling gags at her expense.

Incidentally, those golf games are a nightmare to the studio front office. The pair will seize upon any excuse to stop work and play golf. They knew this had earned the unit business manager on "Utopia" the name of being the most worried individual in filmdom. So they framed a letter to Buddy DeSylva, the Paramount head, before their new picture started, demanding one day a week off in order to play golf. They sent a carbon copy to the business manager, then thoughtfully destroyed the original. Of course this drove the whole studio nuts looking for the original—but the Terrible Kids were out making a neat seventy-two on the links.

Because of their reputation, sets on which Bing and Bob work are more crowded than any in Hollywood. This prompted Hope to crack one day that if any more visitors came on the set, Paramount would lose a fortune. "There won't be any people left to see our picture in the theaters," he explained.

To visit them on the sets has its dangers, however. Their flair for chorusing insults at anyone who happens along is well known to Hollywood habitues. When Bing's ears are king-size, says Bob. "And your nose would make a good ski slide," Bing retorts.

Hope: "Your house was set on fire by a stork that carried matches." Crosby: "Your children see you so seldom that when you do finally come home they say they think you're making a personal appearance."

Bob to Dorothy Lamour: "Why should I do love scenes with you? You work with animals!"

From romance to roads, from love to a lot of laughs—that describes the Crosby career, with his switch to the popular "Road" comedy series.

they want to attract attention to some luckless bystander they huddle like a football team with a minute to go. This happened one day when Lamour appeared wearing a new hat. There was a moment of silence, the feared huddle, and a chorused "Darling! Why don't you ever pick something we don't have to get used to?"

Another time when a production man had made a mistake and was afraid that Dorothy would take him to task, they saved the day by yelling in unison, "Don't worry, Joe. Dorothy never had anything on anybody. Not even herself."

A new producer who had made sensational successes of his first two films, one day made the mistake of visiting the "Utopia" set. At the moment a rehearsal, was going on. It ended abruptly as Hope spotted the producer and yelled, "Hey! Can I have your autograph? I know you're a success now so don't bother writing it. Just dictate it."

Then there was the director who complained of feeling ill when he chanced to bump into the two stars.

Bing and Bob stood off from the poor man, looked him over carefully and both shook their heads. Finally Bob asked the director to stick out his tongue. When the worthy complied, Hope advised mournfully, "You had better see a doctor right away! I've seen better coats on Crosby!"

Another producer, a smalltimer, who had once worked at Paramount, made the mistake of opening the door to the "Utopia" set. Both the lads saw him at the same time, invited him in, gave him a chair, and told him to make himself comfortable. The producer told them he was making one of the biggest pictures of his career, was evidently impressed with the idea of impressing the stars. Realizing this, Crosby turned to Hope. "Bob," he said, with admiration, "here's the man who holds the fate of his studio in the hollow of his head."

The studio manicurist, new to the lot, was anxious to watch the Utopians in action. It had been a trying day on the set. Everyone, including the stars and Walker, was on edge. Take after take went haywire. Suddenly Hope discovered the manicurist and exclaimed, "With everyone here biting (Continued on page 78)

CAN'T SHUT ME UP

A BEAUTIFUL AND FEARLESS CHAMPION PLEADS THE CAUSE OF ENLISTED MEN

I HAVE been publicly spanked by the Army, or that portion of it which wears gold shoulder ornaments. Indiscretion and seeking publicity are among charges made against me, and one officer has implied, backhandedly but plainly, that I am a liar. I am not a liar. I have told the truth.

I have always been on outspoken person and when I have something on my mind I like to speak my piece about it. A number of months ago when I returned from a three-weeks tour of Army camps in the southeastern states, I had something important on my mind. My natural impulse, as always, was to speak my piece. But for a few days, I pondered. Should I blurt out what was rankling me, or should I keep my mouth shut, leaving problems that were none of my business to others whose business it was? Should I endanger my career by standing on a soap box, or shut my eyes to a condition that I knew was wrong? I decided to speak my piece.

The Hollywood Victory Committee—an organization affiliated with the USO, that sends Hollywood players out on camp tours—asked me, on my return, to send them a report on my experiences, impressions and reactions. Inasmuch as I had (Continued on page 86)

Love... AND JIM BROWN

by HELEN LOUISE WALKER

She was a model, when he was a tennis star. But she became his bride and Jim became one of the most important new men in movies

Jim Brown as 'Tex' in "Air Force," with Gig Young (left) and John Ridgeley—the role in which the world 'discovered' him.

SOBER people shook their heads and said it wouldn't do. No romance as intense as that could last. Such adoration would burn up all the emotions and stability of two promising young people. Besides, it's a Hollywood axiom that a young actor mustn't marry until he has been established at least a year. Even then, it may injure his standing at the box-office.

Yet, here is young Jim Brown, the subject of all these head-shakings, proclaiming solemnly, "It's all a sort of haze—what's happened to me since I came to Hollywood. Mostly I guess I'll remember it as a series of jolts. The one thing I know for certain is that if I hadn't met Verna, and married her, I wouldn't be in pictures now!"

This so neatly reverses the axiom that it proves there's a story here. It's a doggoned pleasant story, as you shall see.

Jim, you will remember, is that lad who nearly stole "Air Force" in the role of Texas. He neatly wrapped up "Corvette K-225" and called it his own, and in "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" he proves his right to stardom.

The whole Jim Brown love story started in a sort of fairy tale atmosphere, with Jim in the role of the handsome young drifter, and Verna, the pretty girl on the magazine cover who magically came to life. But the follow-up has been rooted in reality, some of it grim, all of it thrilling.

"Y'see," Jim explains in his easy Texas drawl, "I was by way of becomin' what sports writers call a 'tennis bum.' If I escaped that, then I might have wound up being one of those fellows who works and starves and struggles and travels, trying to get a start with a 'name band.' I could play tennis pretty sharply. I could toot a fairly mean trumpet and I liked to sing. I was sure I'd wind up doing at least one of those things—when I came to Hollywood. I just never dreamed of what was really goin' to happen to me!"

What has happened to him has happened so swiftly and so inexorably that it's no wonder things seem hazy—except for the 'jolts.' But those were important.

Jim came to Hollywood, from Texas, in the summer of 1941 to play in the Pacific Southwest Tennis Tournament. He was good and he knew it. A tennis player, he says, meets a lot of people—especially nice girls—and he has a lot of fun. A sharp tennis player can follow the game and have a pretty soft time for himself at the same time. Jim says, "I was young and I liked it. But then, I liked to sing, too. And I was looking around all the time for some band that might take me on. I was crazy about bands. I never thought of trying to act."

But Fate, in the person of actors' agent Henry Willson, visited the tennis tournament one afternoon and presently Jim was startled to find himself under contract to Paramount Studios to do what he described then as "an actin' job."

"I didn't know anything about acting," he apologizes now. "But I've always been the kind of guy who could be talked into things."

He didn't like acting, though. Not at first. He liked the actual work—learning lines, rehearsing, finally doing a scene. That was exciting make-believe and it was fun. "It was the waitin' around that got me down," he says. "I sat and sat and sat. I'm as lazy as the next Texan, goodness knows. But I've always been used to some kind of action, even if it was only goin' fishin'! Most of the time when I was first in pictures there wasn't anything to do but sit—and sit—and wait."

Somewhere there were tennis balls flying and bands playing, while Jim collected paychecks and waited inexplicably to recite one line. It was very easy, but it just wasn't enough. His restlessness grew.

Then came the real jolt. The big one. It was Verna Knopf, a model, then under contract to Howard Hughes. Jim had seen her picture on a magazine cover and he recognized her when she walked into the Paramount commissary. He looked at her in person and he knew, fantastic as it was, that It Had Happened. He knew it, he explains, because he felt queer and also because, for the first time in his healthy young life, his appetite failed him then and there. "I couldn't even eat ham and eggs!" he says, marveling even now.

A day or so later he contrived to meet Verna, and three weeks later they were married. The whole thing was such a stunning experience that to this day Jim can give no coherent account of how this miracle came about. But there was the reality of the apartment in Beverly Hills and there was Verna who was "so beautiful and so clever, who could cook and sew and make the most wonderful flowers grow in pots on the window sills . . ."

"I knew right then that tennis playin' and foolin' around with dance bands was out," Jim recounts. "But I still wasn't a bit sure about picture work. I thought we might go back and live in Waco where fifty dollars a week looks as big as five hundred does in Hollywood."

When he finished "Forest Rangers", he was still bewildered and unhappy. His pride had suffered some serious blows, so he got a leave of absence and he and Verna went to Chicago to visit her mother, while he thought it all over. Then he had a wire, offering a test for the role in "Air Force". Another jolt.

"The opportunity was so good," he says, "that it changed the color of everything. All of a sudden I saw actin' as a real job, an important job which would let me take care of Verna in style and maybe even make her proud of me. All of a sudden I couldn't stand it if I didn't get that part. We had an awful time gettin' back here for me to take that test. We nearly didn't make it on time. But we had to. It seemed to me right then that everything I wanted most was at stake."

Thus, though he wasn't aware of it then, Jim began to grow up. He began to see what his job was. He stopped being merely a handsome, talented, drifting kid. He still didn't understand (Continued on page 72)

DISCOVERIES OF THE MONTH

Jennifer Jones

NEVER in all movie history has any month registered so many hits by so many new players as did the initial month of the brave new year, 1944. Even one potential star discovered every thirty days is an average seldom attained—but January, 1944, sang forth with seven. Count 'em! Seven personalities so incandescent that Hollywood sat back more bedazzled than it has been since sound floored the established silent stars and brought in a complete roster of new names, via stage and radio.

Movieland, always trying to give you the inside information of the newest Hollywood events, herewith presents a quick preview of these illustrious seven. Their stories prove that there is no rule for Hollywood success. Their faces prove the interesting fact: save for John Hodiak, they are not conventional star types. Of the three girls, only one—Gail Russell—has the golden glow of glamour.

Most important, possibly because of the greatness of her title role in "The Song of Bernadette," is Jennifer Jones. Like Kim Hunter (on page 56), her contract is shared by David Selznick and an outside studio—in Jennifer's case, 20th Century-Fox, producers of "Bernadette." Unlike shy Kim, the Jones story has been so often proclaimed to the world that it needs small repeating here, other than to say she was born Phyllis Isley, child of theatrical parents, in Tulsa, Oklahoma. She got her acting training on the road, in stock companies and in radio—with one short disastrous Hollywood bout, under her real name, in Westerns.

It was in 1939. Jennifer had been varying her dramatic experience, first with work at the Cherry Lane Theatre in New York, then with an assignment to select, direct and cast plays for a Tulsa radio station. Her first tryout in films was with John Wayne, in a picture for Republic. The production schedule was a tough one, hurrying the whole picture through to be made in just a couple of weeks. Jennifer decided it was too much. If that was what a girl had to go through to get started in Hollywood, she was going to have none of it—and that was that!

Next time she went there though, of course, it was a different story.

She and Selznick put a quick one over on Twentieth, who were searching for an innocent lass for "Bernadette," for even as she signed for the part, Jennifer was the wife of Robert Walker (under contract to MGM) and the mother of two sturdy sons. Currently, the Walkers are separated.

John Hodiak

JOHN HODIAK got his big break—the lead opposite Tallulah Bankhead in "Lifeboat," directed by Alfred Hitchcock—because Hitchcock was looking for a fine Negro actor.

It happened like this. The big break came about because John had worked in a test with the distinguished Negro star, Canada Lee. The test was entirely slanted for Canada Lee and John could merely have walked through it. If he had, his story might well have ended in the crowded list of players under contract to MGM. Like numerous others at numerous other studios, John might have been one of those young unknowns who gets signed for six months, never gets within breathing distance of a camera, and then drops into oblivion.

But not Mr. Hodiak. John is made of tough stuff and he had the good sense to act for all he was worth whenever he got the chance. The Canada Lee test was a chance, even though a small one. Hitchcock, looking at the test to see Lee's work, noticed a handsome hunk of muscle in the background. He announced to MGM that he would like to borrow same. Metro did nip-ups, having completely forgotten they had anything like that around the lot since Gable went away. They found they had him tucked into the tiniest bit in Red Skelton's "I Dood It." So John was loaned to Hitchcock, and MGM sat back contemplating a most brilliant future for him.

A brilliant future doesn't irk John. He likes the idea, since his past has been more than a bit on the gloomy side.

He was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., the son of Ukranian immigrants. His father was, and still is, a factory worker. But he was also a talented amateur and the love of acting was in John's blood. He was working in church plays and parish productions, by the time he was eight years old. In high school he concentrated his efforts on school plays, even while taking life very seriously and having an idea he'd like to enter the priesthood.

Instead, though, he was to try his hand at professional baseball, with one of the Cardinal club teams. Tiring of that, he tried for entrance to West Point, and failed. He tried radio acting, worked for three years at the Chevrolet Motor Co. plant, winding up finally with a job as "Lil Abner" on the air. Hollywood grabbed him in late 1942.

John is that current rarity in Hollywood, a bachelor. He lives alone in a Beverly Hills apartment and does his own cooking. His next role is the lead opposite the high temperature Lana Turner in MGM's "Marriage is a Private Affair."

Gail Russell

GAIL RUSSELL is a hometown girl who made good. She is a sloe-eyed, exquisitely curved young amateur who after two infinitesimal bits in other pictures finds herself, with the difficult leading role of "The Uninvited," on the threshold of stardom.

Yes, she has sex appeal—also a distinctive sort of glamour. But how did she get into pictures?

As the story goes, there were two lads thumbing a ride one night, and they were picked up by Paramount's talent scout, Al Micheljohn, on his way to a preview. As he talked to the boys Micheljohn revealed his profession. Immediately the boys went into raves.

"There's a girl right in our high school you ought to see," they declared. "Is she a dish! She's wonderful. We call her the Hedy Lamarr of Santa Monica, only she's more beautiful than Hedy. Why don't you see her?"

So he did. And Micheljohn found that the boys hadn't exaggerated. Here was freshness, youth and beauty, all stacked in one very neat American package. The next day an excited Miss Russell was at Paramount taking a screen test. Later that same afternoon, she was signing a contract.

Born in Chicago, Ill., Gail Russell grew up in Glendale, Calif. She'd always meant to be an artist. Her life, save for schoolgirl parties, had been entirely filled with school work and art classes.

She made her debut in "Henry Aldrich Gets Glamour," then played a dancing bit in "Lady in the Dark." Her big break, however, came with "The Uninvited"—and that because the studio wanted Joan Fontaine for the role and couldn't get her. And also because Charles Brackett, the film's producer, had great courage.

The girl for the part had to be intelligent, sensitive and beautiful. Producer Brackett recognized that Gail was all of that. Unfortunately, the girl also had to be English. Gail is very American, but Brackett got around that difficulty by hiring an English diction coach.

There was the problem, too, with Ray Milland, the picture's name star, who was disturbed about playing opposite so untried an actress. Just until after the first day did that problem exist. Then Milland went bounding into the front office. "Congratulate me on my new leading woman," he said, with his typical exuberance. "I'm playing opposite one of the most talented young actresses in the business."

Cornelia Otis Skinner had one of the principal roles in "The Uninvited." Which makes it a coincidence that Gail plays that lady herself in her next film, "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay." And that title is a perfect description of Gail herself.

William Prince

Kim Hunter

WHEN you can be an outstanding hit in a picture that stars Cary Grant and John Garfield, you're good. But past masters though they are, at the game of keeping camera attention, these stars are also generous, as proved by the fact that they allowed two newcomers, Robert Hutton and William Prince, to get their much-deserved share of spotlight glory in "Destination Tokyo."

Though the life of William Prince is interesting in the past, the vital era of his life is just begun—for if the service doesn't immediately get him he is expected to be a headliner of tomorrow.

Bill is married to a wise and pretty girl named Dorothy, and they have a three-year-old son, Jeremy. No story of Bill can be told that doesn't include Dorothy. They met during college days and married in New York, while Bill worked for National Broadcasting Company.

Wonder-man William Prince got the bug to act from his high school public speaking teacher, Walter Roberts, who had been on the New York stage and was a soldier-actor with Elsie Janis in the first world war. During his courses in elocution young Bill found that he wanted to make acting his life work. So he went to college for three years, then went to New York where he took part in the W.P.A. production of "Taming of the Shrew." After "Shrew," he went to summer stock—but the job folded.

Plugging away, Bill took time out to put some money ahead and went to work in the statistical department of NBC. Then with the money saved from his figures job, he started hunting an opening to act on Broadway. Job hunting on Broadway is tough, and Bill, like other aspiring Hamlets, found it meant drug store lunches and plenty of brush-offs. It was a period of small parts and hard work, through which he was gradually acquiring the all-important experience. Included was a job with Max Reinhardt in "The Eternal Road" and two seasons with Maurice Evans and Shakespeare.

Then Mrs. Prince sold some stocks and they went to Europe. They were in Munich when the German-Russian "pact" was signed, saw Paris during the mobilization—then managed to get out of Europe, just the day before Germany marched on Poland.

It was a year after their return from abroad before Bill's big break finally came. There were roles for him in "Ah Wilderness," "Guest in the House" and the quick-closing "Across the Board on Tomorrow Morning." Then came the "Eve of St. Mark" part, which won him his Warner Bros. contract.

Success! And a brilliant future indicated.

A YEAR ago Kim Hunter was an unknown in Miami, Florida. Today, with "Tender Comrade," she is one of the promising young actresses in Hollywood. Her story differs from the standard Cinderella yarn in that it didn't all "just happen." Since Kim was nine she has worked hard towards her career, taking advantage of every opportunity, building her own knowledge.

When Kim was four she wanted to be in the Navy. When she was six she decided to be a dress designer, but when she was nine she started taking parts in school pageants and plays—and from then on her chief ambition was to be an actress. Even at nine, though, she realized that to become an actress meant work. And work she did—taking private lessons in diction, stage movement and memory exercises. In her senior high school year she did several plays.

Next came summer stock in Baltimore, where she worked with fervor the summer following her high school graduation. Here she played Deirdre in "Old Acquaintance," Cecily in "The Importance of Being Earnest" and Ellen in "My Darling Daughter."

After Baltimore, back she went to Miami, where she stayed until her adventure trip to Pasadena, where she won parts at the famed Pasadena Playhouse. She was seen there by Hollywood agent Leon Lance, who helped her to the contract which was signed by that great actor discoverer, David O. Selznick.

When Mr. Selznick screen-tested Kim Hunter he found exceptional talent and RKO became so interested that they asked for a part of her contract, to which Selznick agreed. In her initial picture, "The Seventh Victim," she played the lead. It wasn't such shakes as a picture, but Kim performed with such sincerity that she was chosen to play the second feminine lead in Ginger Rogers' "Tender Comrade." And the result . . . she captured all critics, to the extent that quick stardom is now prophesied for her.

If you believe in the power of a name, or the power of heredity, you will see this girl winning on both counts. For Kim Hunter's first name was taken from the Kim in Edna Ferber's "Showboat." In the heredity department, Kim's mother had been a concert pianist and accompanied many well-known singers, before her retirement from professional life. Mrs. Hunter was attracted to public life. She lived and loved music, so there were lessons for Kim, too—but Kim always knew her course was acting.

Birth notices report her arrival in Detroit, Mich., on November 12, 1922. But though she is young and laughter-loving, she has a remarkable depth of feeling.

Danny Kaye

Bob Hutton

DANNY KAYE is a funny man. There'll be no doubt of it in your mind after seeing the big Sam Goldwyn musical, "Up in Arms," which marks Danny's screen debut. For he wraps it up riotously.

He's as crazy off-screen as on. He's fascinated by makeup and loves to don silly beards and dash around while he plays a long lost uncle, a Russian refugee, an ancient plumber or an escaped lunatic.

Broadway's Guthrie McClintic wanted him for "The Pirate," England's Gabriel Paschal would like to star him as Macbeth, the Metropolitan Opera's Edward Johnson described him as a perfect "Figaro." But Danny says, "A shoemaker should stick to his laffs."

Because Danny Kaye's name became famous all of a sudden, many people think he's an overnight sensation. What they don't know is that for twelve years he played every whistle stop in America and knocked himself out being funny all over the world. After high school he worked at everything from soda jerking to waiting tables. He was funny all the time. And after five years of catch-as-catch-can, he landed in a vaudeville act which was part of a show which was heading for the Orient—the Philippines, China, and Japan.

In 1935 he returned to New York and tried to break in on Broadway. When he didn't succeed he toured with Sally Rand (not as a fan), Abe Lyman, and stooged for Nick Long, Jr., from Texas to London.

In 1939, he met Sylvia. It was an important event, for later Sylvia Fine became Sylvia Kaye—and she has contributed importantly to Danny's success. Mrs. Kaye is a writer of lyrics and music, and she knows her Danny. She helps him plan routines, helps handle business affairs. Because Sylvia and Danny are opposities, they think that's what makes them happy. A balanced marriage. She's even-tempered, he's volatile. Sylvia is analytic, Danny lives by instinct. She walks, Danny runs. She talks, Danny listens. They like the same people and laugh at the same things.

Danny's friends range from old Brooklyn pals to Lady Mendl, and he loves to mix them. All of Danny's contracts are purely verbal, and he's never gone back on a promise. Sylvia and Max Liebman write all his material and supervise everything he does, professionally. What he does in private life no one could supervise.

He's one of the hardest working entertainers for benefits and bond rallies. When it comes to profile he'll never give Bob Taylor any serious competition, but when he gets in action, as in "Up in Arms," you'll see an endearing quality about him, behind all his laughter, that makes him seem like an old friend.

BOB HUTTON looks like a typical American boy. He isn't. His life has always fallen in too comfortable lines to be typical and his ambition has always been too crystal clear for him ever to go through that muddled period most boys experience.

Bob Winne was born in Kingston, New York, and it wasn't until he really got going at acting that he adopted his mother's maiden name of Hutton. He attended Blair Academy in New Jersey, where he attracted attention at such varied sports as tennis, track, wrestling and hockey. Athletic coaches from many colleges began swarming over him, but Bob knew what he wanted. He wanted to act.

He went up to the famous little Woodstock Theatre, which wasn't too far away from his own town of Kingston, and got himself a job there. He was only in his teens (he's a ripe twenty-three right now), and he had to share honors with such experienced Thespians as Elissa Landi, Claire Luce, and Julie Haydon.

One season in stock gave Bob the idea that he was just what Hollywood wanted. He was right, but he got the timing wrong on it. The winter after he left Woodstock, he came to movieland. Not a leaf stirred. No talent scouts pursued him. Not a studio cared whether he lived or died. But one thing did happen to him. Love.

Love came to him at Pickfair, the home of Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers. Bob had been invited to a party, and into same party came Natalie Thompson, a Los Angeles social belle. Bob looked at Natalie and Natalie looked at him, and the room whirled. The only trouble—and it was plenty—was that Bob was broke.

He fled back to Broadway. He couldn't get a tumble. He went back to Woodstock. They gave him a job at that coffee and cake money which may keep the wolf from the door but which keeps romance away also.

So he became a commercial photographer. And it was while he was being a busy cameraman that Louis Shurr, an agent, saw him. Shurr arranged a screen test. Warner's saw to that. And next thing Bob saw was a dotted line at the bottom of a contract, with his name all neatly affixed to it.

Back to Hollywood, back to Natalie—and thereupon life for Bob became as rosy as a postcard. Warners liked him and put him in the fine debut role of the sensitive young kid in "Destination Tokyo." Natalie put him in her heart, so completely that a week before "Destination Tokyo" was previewed she and Bob were married.

Now he's been rushed into the male lead of "Janie," and all's very much well. Hutton's on his way.

THIS IS MYSELF

BY ANN SHERIDAN

Annie Sheridan—her big problem in life, getting rid of the Oomph title; her pet aversion, wise-crackers who still use that stale old tag.

I'VE LEARNED:

To be careful with my heart.

To laugh when I'm hurt, for then the hurt heals more quickly.

Not to expect things from people and to be grateful when, unexpectedly, loyalties and kindnesses, good faith, favors and good fortune come my way.

Not to wear my shoes too tight.

Never to say I won't do this or that because you never know about Tomorrow.

Not to let gossip bother me, for regardless of how hard you try, there is always someone to misunderstand and misconstrue.

Never to criticize other people lest before the words are out of my mouth, I find myself doing the very things I've deplored in them.

I'M GRATEFUL FOR:

The fact that I am not in love, and am free as a breeze.

My career; for the things I've done and the things I've seen and the people I've met, which the career has made possible.

My parents, for the fearless outlook on life they gave me.

My sense of buoyancy and the fact that I very seldom brood or mope.

My whole childhood, which was just a normal, "everybody's kid" existence.

My friends and the happiness they give me.

The fact that I have no fear of old age but only the

LUM AND ABNER ARE GIVING AWAY

$2000 in WAR BONDS!

First Prize . . . . $1000 War Bond
Second Prize (5) . . $100 War Bonds
Third Prize (10) . . $50 War Bonds

All Bonds Donated by RKO Radio Pictures, Inc.

DID you get in on Movieland's announcement of the Lum and Abner Contest in last month's issue? If not, we're just back again to tell you that the first letters are coming in, and we want your help to answer our question "Should Lum and Abner go romantic?" Yes, that's the business at hand. So fall to, with your trusty little pen.

Lum and Abner want to know, and Movieland wants to know, should the boys give up their old series of films following their radio shows, such as the characters in their movie "So This Is Washington"—or, should they play romantic leads like Cooper, Grant and Cagney? Making such a step is serious business, and they're depending on their fans to advise them.

As prizes make a contest more interesting, $2000 in War Bonds will go to the winners. The first prize is a $1000 Bond. There will be five $100 Bond prizes and ten $50 Bond prizes.

These rewards are offered for the best letters of advice, not to be longer than 250 words each, telling Lum and Abner—Chet Lauck and Norris Goff—what you would like them to do.

Letters should be addressed to Lum and Abner Contest Editor, Movieland, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California.

The contest closes April 1, 1944. No letters postmarked after midnight of that date can be judged. Every letter will be read and notations made of the readers' suggestions. Then the letters will be analyzed and graphed. It'll be like an election. The voice of the people will speak and the stars will be guided by the popular vote, rather than by individual suggestions, however brilliant.

While the boys wait for your response, they will go on as they have been. They will continue their radio shows, five per week, Monday through Friday, over the Blue Network. They may even film another Lum and Abner picture before the matter of their future is decided.

They'll wait for advice from their friends before they bow to producer pressure to step before the cameras as their useful selves.

They want your opinion. So write immediately to the Lum and Abner Contest Editor, Movieland, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California.

Lum 'n' Abner as they're known to twenty million radio fans. But under that makeup are a couple of possible Romeos, and they're asking you to help them decide what to do about it.

Norris Goff and Chester Lauck are man-about-town material in their tweeds. Fact is, you may not even recognize them this way, being so used to seeing them as whiskered old men.

RULES:

1. Write 250 words or less telling why you think Lum and Abner should continue with their character roles—or—why you believe they should play straight romantic leads.
2. Fill in the coupon below, attach it to your letter and mail to the Contest Editor.
3. Submit one entry only.
4. All entries become MOVIELAND property.
5. Anyone may enter this contest except employees of MOVIELAND, INC., and of RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., and members of their families.
6. The contest closes midnight, April 1, 1944.
7. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in case of ties. Neatness will be considered.
8. Decisions of the contest judges will be final.

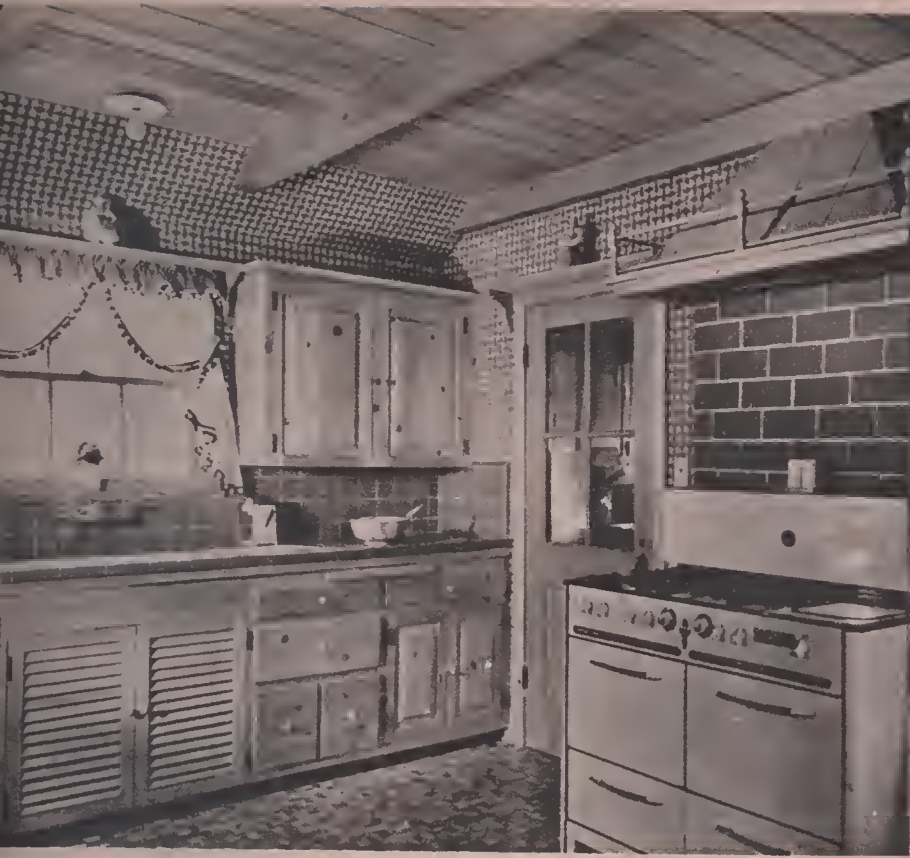
High in a canyon, nestled in the hills not so far from Hollywood, a house that's not large—but comfortable, inviting. A quaint little French farm house which was designed for genuine living.

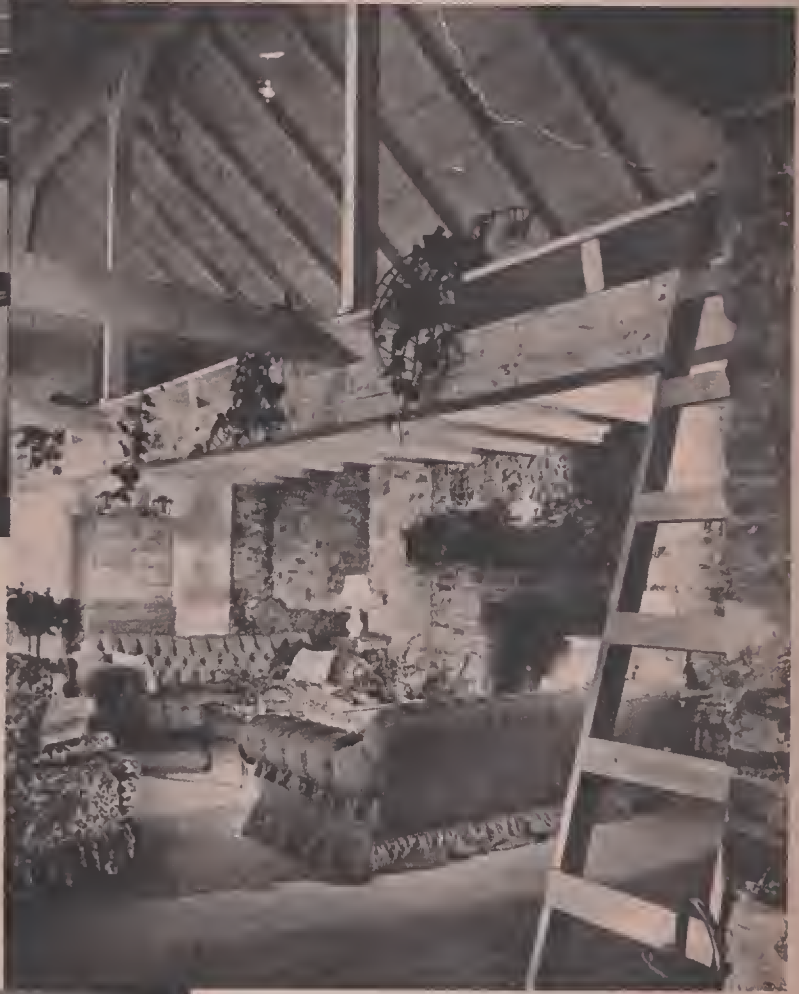
Home of a Star . . . MICHELE MORGAN'S

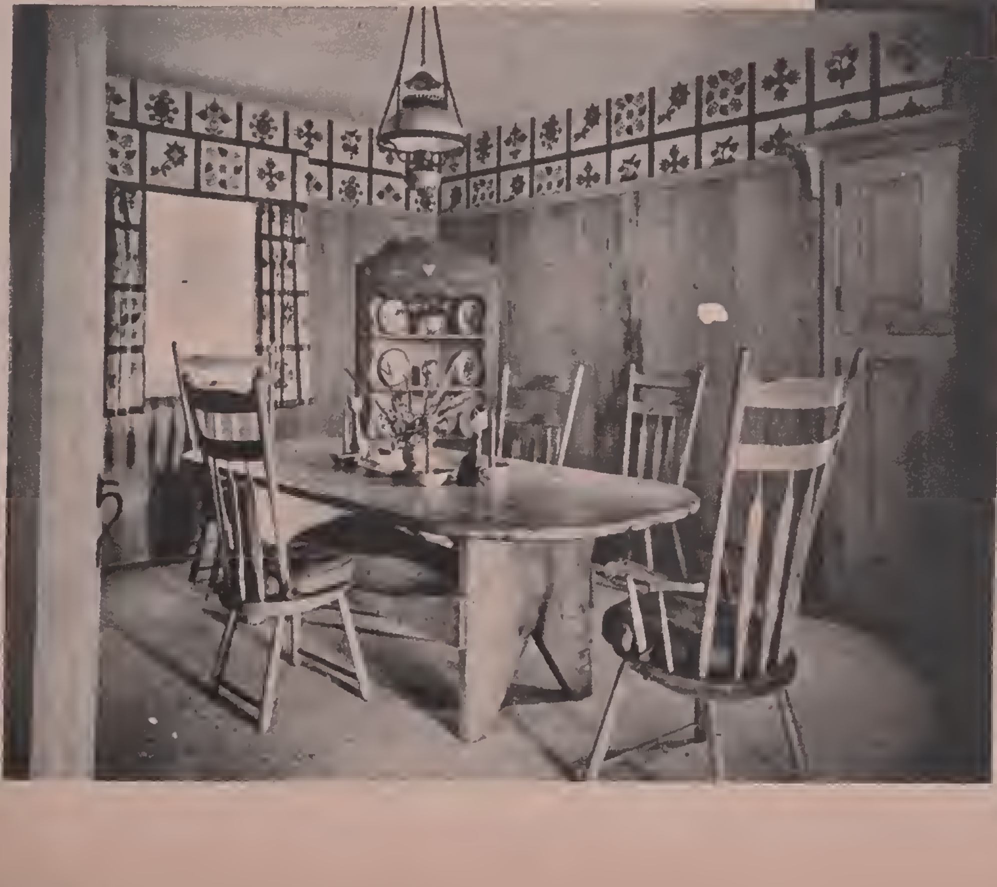
Movieland brings you the second in a series of pictorial descriptions of the homes where the movie stars live. And here's one that really does more than its share in indicating the tastes and personalities of the people who live there. Romantic—quaint—adjectives just trip off the tongue when describing the house where Michele Morgan waits for soldier husband, Bill Marshall. Like many Army wives, she keeps the hearth warm, knowing Bill likes to come here on furloughs. While he's away Michele lives here with Bill's mother—missing him, but busy planning for the day of that great homecoming, when they'll be together again. When there will be other al fresco dinners, as before— and outdoor parties, with guests served on the lawn beside this clear as crystal fish pool. There's comfort and reassurance in homes like this, tucked in between the surrounding hills and valleys, a tranquil retreat from the busy activity of the studio. The artistic detail seems reminiscent of old provincial France—a poem of simplicity.



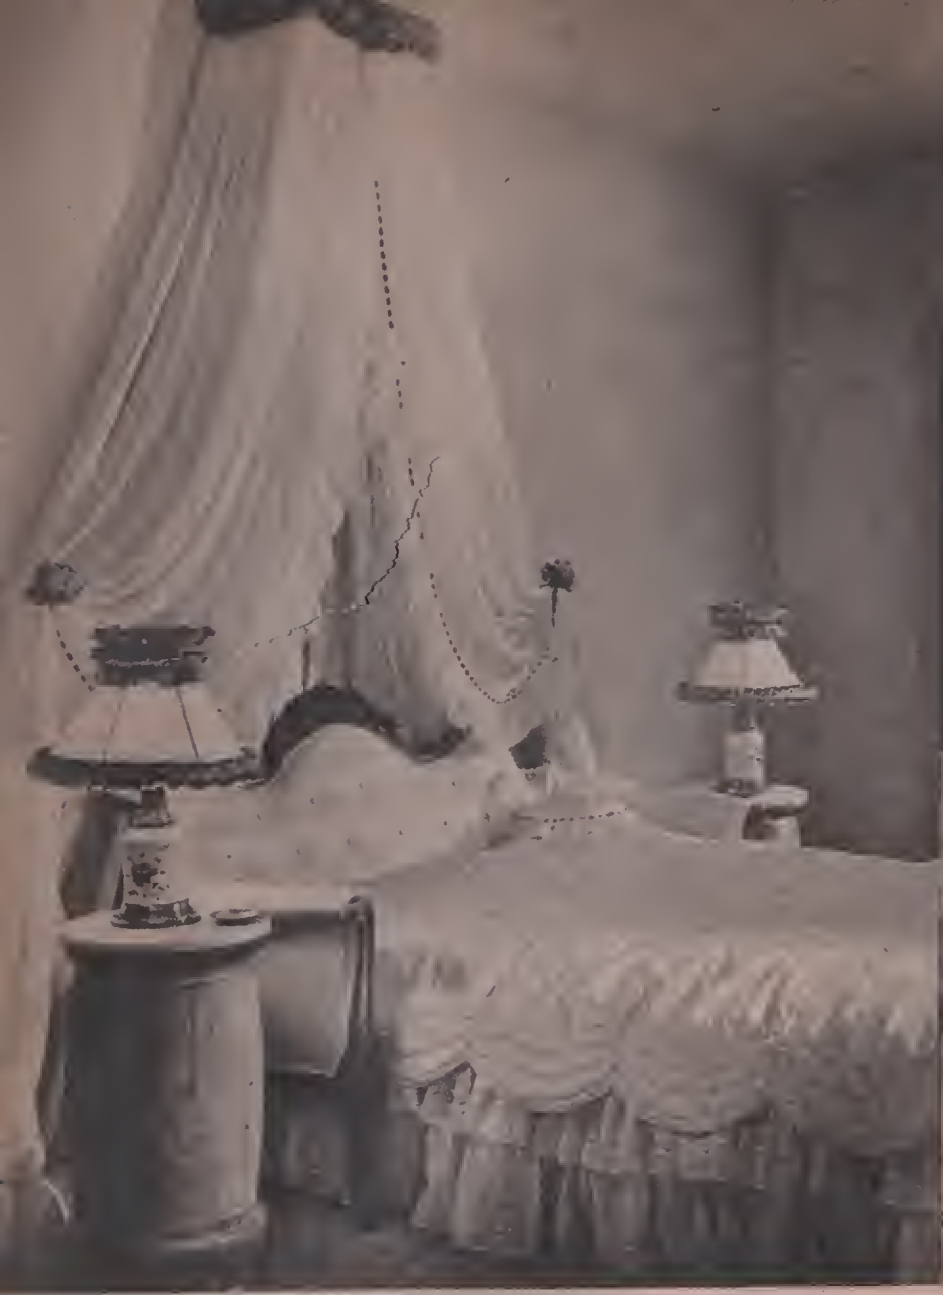
Warmth of color and detail make the kitchen a livable room, as well as functional. Red and blue checked wallpaper fills in between the knotty pine cupboards and a plank ceiling. Curtains are white dotted Swiss, with maroon and white ball fringe picking up the color accent set by the maroon tile service board and the linoleum.

At one side of the beam-ceilinged living room is a stone wall encasing a large deep fireplace, the rugged massiveness of which becomes doubly impressive with the addition of a solid block wood mantel. Other features include gay printed cushions for the cozy side-of-the-hearth seats, a wooden ladder for the ascent to the overhanging loft, and a well-placed assortment of growing plants. Potted vines trailing down over the edge of the loft, ferns in the wells of the custom-designed coffee table, and other greenery in stands about the room. Color is used with restraint. The two large couches are upholstered with green chenille; the chairs are covered with matching floral print chintz.





There's nothing monotonous about this house. Yet with the infinite variety of details, all are logicall,, thoughtfully combined and the effect achieved is a comfortable glow, warm and inviting hospitality. One has only to look at this dining room, for instance, and there's a feeling of being included for the candle-lit dinner parties Michele presides over there, when Bill is home on leave. It may be the simplicity of the big oval plank table, the high back chairs, or the French peasant corner cupboard. Whatever it is, the room has a definite atmosphere. A charm all its own, and a certain air of serenity.



MICHELE MORGAN

← Quality things are versatile, you know. Still, who but someone as ingenious as Michele would have had the idea for making a bed out of what was originally an antique couch? The tufted blue silk covering is matched by the quilted silk coverlet—and what could be more daintily feminine, as a complement to frothy white drapes hanging full to form the canopy above? For the wall hanging behind the curtains, pink and orchid taffeta, the pink picked up again for velvet ribbons laced along the eyelet ruffle flounce. The rosettes holding the tie-backs in place are little forget-me-not bouquets. And don't overlook those barrel-like stands, with the two French porcelain lamps and white silk shades.

Make believe that you are going visiting. This is the guest bedroom that would be assigned to you at Michele's home, and it's really one of the nicest rooms of all. The many paned windows afford the most breathtaking view. Birdseye maple desk and chest are Early American, and quite in harmony as being of the same period, note the two porcelain lamps, wired for electricity. The fringed rug is cream colored, window valances are brown and cream.

Back to the kitchen, where sunny breakfasts are served at this drop-leaf walnut table—and see all the cupboard space, how well it's arranged!

An air of openness prevails, thanks to the logical use of large windows, curtained without obstructing the view. The drapery print is red and green, with solid color ruffles. Four chairs covered with green check cotton are tufted with green buttons. French porcelain plates lining the walls, also tables and benches all typically Early American, reflect both a preference for the unelaborate in decoration and a keen appreciation for the charm of fine antiques.

It's the dining room again, rephotographed to give you a more detailed view of the quaint drapes and wall frieze—gingham figures appliqued on a field of cream chintz. Shades of reminiscence, harking back to some of Grandma's fine old calico quilt patterns.

A corner of the living room features a bar, paneled in pine. The shelf and cupboard are Early American pieces of walnut wood, and those are real pewter jugs you see on the floor. The rug is cherry red, bright and gay but not gawdy. All of which goes to prove that dreams can come true, and dream homes do exist.

HOLLYWOOD'S SERVICE WIVES Solve the Date Problem

BY ALICE L. TILDESLEY

THE beautiful wives of Hollywood have to solve the "date" problem facing millions of wives throughout America, and they solve it in the most individualistic ways.

"All my time belongs to my husband," asserted Michele Morgan, still in a lovely daze from telephone contact with husband William Marshall, cadet in the Air Corps. "He will soon be with me. I know the exact number of hours and minutes until he comes. He knows what I shall do with each hour.

"It is wrong for any girl married to a man in service to give him cause to worry about her. He has enough to worry about in his new hard life, under strict discipline perhaps for the first time, with difficult courses to study, with dreadful things to do, being trained to face—or actually facing—thirst and hunger, cold, fever or death, without having to be uncertain of his wife.

"He must have one person who lives only for him, who belongs to him and is steadfast and true. He has been torn from a familiar, satisfying, friendly existence and thrust into one that is strange and unnatural. He needs an anchor at home.

"I hear girls say there's no harm in going out with another man, having dancing dates, playing about here and there while waiting for the war to end. But I think that is dreadful!

"The wife of a man in service should be for her husband and for him alone. He likes to think she could

RYAN
THE RIP-ROARING ADVENTURER

THIS is the story of a young man who came to Hollywood a star and would have departed, save for a handful of preview comment cards, a bit player.

It is the story of an ex-sandhog, ex-sailor, ex-salesman of cemetery lots, ex-bodyguard for a gangster, ex-photographic model who never gave a thought to acting until he was twenty-six.

It is the story of big Bob Ryan, who the day before he was inducted into the army won the lead opposite Ginger Rogers in "Tender Comrade."

It is a story of a guy who seems to get furthest ahead by getting set back.

Bob Ryan came to Hollywood a year and a half ago to star in Pare Lorentz' "Name, Age and Occupation." His hopes were high then. The lean years were past. Lorentz had seen him with Tallulah Bankhead in "Clash By Night" on Broadway, and Lorentz had decided he was film star material. So there was Ryan, whose only camera experience had been in front of a Brownie, with the lead in one of the biggest pictures of the year. There was a guy who had known what it was to be hungry and to work and sweat and slave. Now he had a dressing room of his own and a good fat pay check and a great future ahead of him.

"Look at this," Ryan said that day. He handed us a note from Corey Ford, the writer, to which was attached a check for $250.

"Wait until you've arrived," the note advised curtly.

"He loaned me that money two years ago," Ryan explained. "I was to pay it back when I hit pay dirt. I figured this was it and I sent him back his two-fifty. Look what happened."

"Maybe Mr. Ford is a cynic," we suggested, then.

"Or a prophet," said Ryan grinning. "Maybe I haven't arrived."

It turned out that Ford was something of a prophet. "Name, Age and Occupation" was scrapped and Lorentz departed from the RKO lot.

may have had something to do with what really happened to Bob Ryan. All set to be an army private, he made the Raider picture (to be released this month) and was inducted on January 17—as a Marine! Just one case where a star, assigned a role on the screen, will play the part in real life—in an important show for Uncle Sam.

WHEN Universal first got the idea of casting that hottest of hot jitterbugs, that heppest of hep cats, Irish Peggy Ryan, as the girl who didn't get Donald O'Connor, it little knew the trouble it was creating for itself.

The studio thought it was a swell idea. The Bing Crosby-Bob Hope-Dorothy Lamour triangle had netted millions for Paramount, so why couldn't Universal have a triangle all its own? Only strictly with jive kids.

Nobody had ever kicked because Bob Hope rarely got the girl. So how could Universal guess what it was starting when the chick with the blue eyes, the brown hair and the hep manner, couldn't get Donald?

Letters began to pour in protesting this state of affairs. "Why don't you shake the dust out of your eyes?" the jive fans wanted to know. "We kids are hep, and we don't like those icky heroines you've been giving Donald O'Connor. For Pete's sake, why? He's supposed to be hep, too. Why should he make love to a square, when Peggy Ryan is around?"

Peggy has now made about nine pictures in which she didn't, etc. But now Universal has started to make amends. In "Patrick the Great," the gal who gets Donald is Peggy, who's always on the beam.

I went around to find out how Peggy was taking it. It was lunchtime and she ordered "a tomato and lettuce salad and all that jive."

"Are you going to be strictly a glamour girl from now on?" I asked.

Peggy laughed. "I should say not. I'll stick strictly to laughs, but will I have my moments of glamour! Why, I have seventeen changes of costume and look so glamorous that Maria Montez is drooling, she's so jealous. When I play Madame Zam in one number, I do a mind reading act and wear the powder blue costume, with the big georgette pants and the stunning blue jacket that Maria wore in 'Ali Baba.' And to top it, a turban Marlene Dietrich wore in 'Three Cheers for the Boys.' My midriff is bare, like Maria's. Between Marlene's and Maria's (Continued on page 80)

LIEUTENANT (j.g.)
Robert Stack
INSTRUCTOR

Hollywood cast aside until victory and six months after, handsome but a tired Lt. Stack studies the theory of aerial gunnery. And at 1:30 in the morning!

There is always a moment or two on the firing range for the Stack wit to come through. Here he shows a group of gunnery students a belt of .30 caliber ammunition. By the way, too, he's a rank higher now—an ensign promoted to lieutenant j.g.

Instructor Stack calls out orders to the men along the firing line at a U.S. Naval Air Station gunnery range. The sailor making an adjustment to his machine gun is Thomas Gudgel, an aviation ordnanceman, second class, from Springfield, Ill.

The infectious Stack grin, so typical of the officers of our Navy today who love the work they are doing in defeating the nation's enemies. After many months of training, Lt. Stack is well qualified to handle the Flying Navy's heavy artillery.

ADVICE TO YOUTH

YOUTH problems! There has never been a time when they were so important as they are today.

Are you one of the hundreds of thousands of teenagers in this country who is lonely and bewildered?

Are you one of the girls who is khaki-wacky, who goes for any guy in a uniform?

Or are you one of those lads in uniform, away from home for the first time in your life, and all mixed up as to what to do about the girl you left behind you—and the girls you see right in front of you?

Are you a service bride, with too much time on your hands, or a teen-age mother suddenly left all alone in the world with his baby to bring up, and the necessity of finding a job?

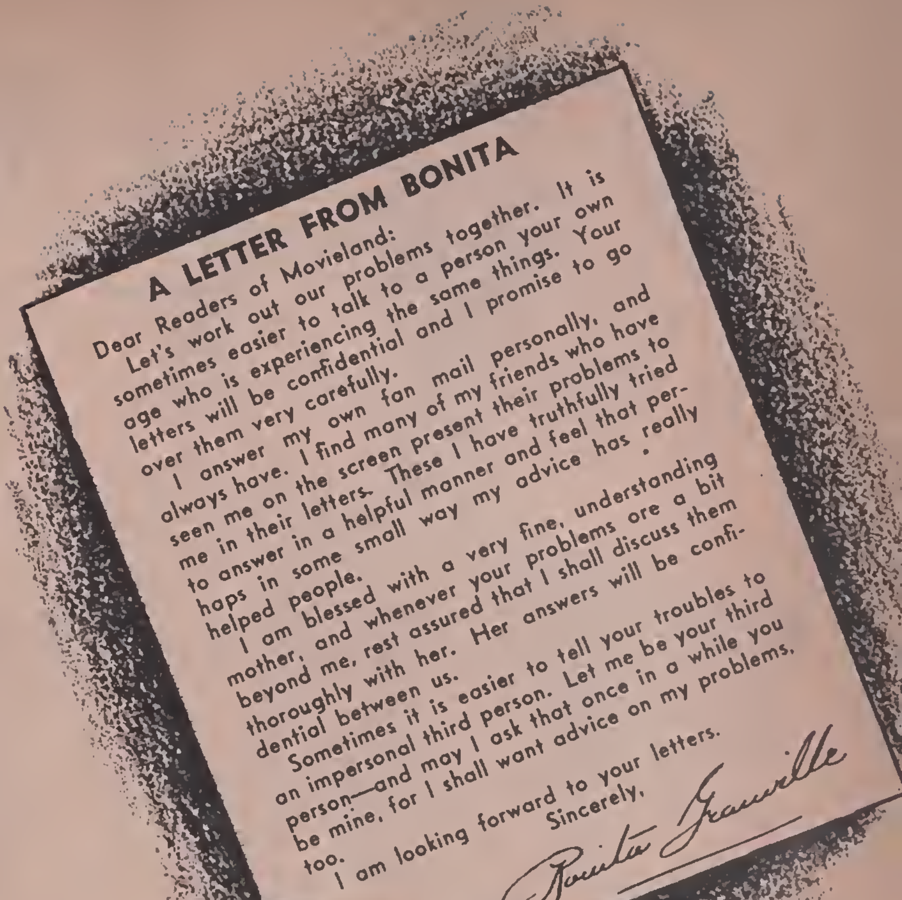
Movieland believes that as much as elders may sincerely want to help youth, actually only the generations understand one another. Youth knows youth, because it has youth's problems to face, just as age knows age for the same reason.

Thus Movieland has chosen Bonita Granville, who is just twenty, to advise its young readers on youth problems.

Bonita seems to us the ideal youth counselor because she is neither a flaming jitterbug nor a goody-goody girl. She may be a Hollywood leading lady, but she's also a typical American girl, with very typical problems.

So let Bonita advise you. Tell her what's worrying you and read her honest, forthright answers on this page, beginning next month.

Address Bonita Granville, in care of Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles 46, California. Please try to keep it down to two hundred words—and write today.



A LETTER FROM BONITA

Dear Readers of Movieland:

Let's work out our problems together. It is sometimes easier to talk to a person your own age who is experiencing the same things. Your letters will be confidential and I promise to go over them very carefully.

I answer my own fan mail personally, and always have. I find many of my friends who have seen me on the screen present their problems to me in their letters. These I have truthfully tried to answer in a helpful manner and feel that perhaps in some small way my advice has really helped people.

I am blessed with a very fine, understanding mother, and whenever your problems are a bit beyond me, rest assured that I shall discuss them thoroughly with her. Her answers will be confidential between us.

Sometimes it is easier to tell your troubles to an impersonal third person. Let me be your third person—and may I ask that once in a while you be mine, for I shall want advice on my problems, too.

I am looking forward to your letters.

Sincerely,

Bonita Granville

Star of RKO's "Are These Our Children," Bonita's next picture is "Song of Youth," a musical featuring the Sammy Kaye band.

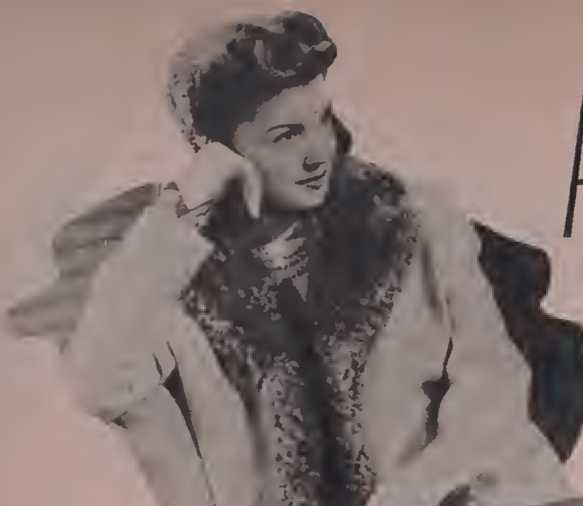
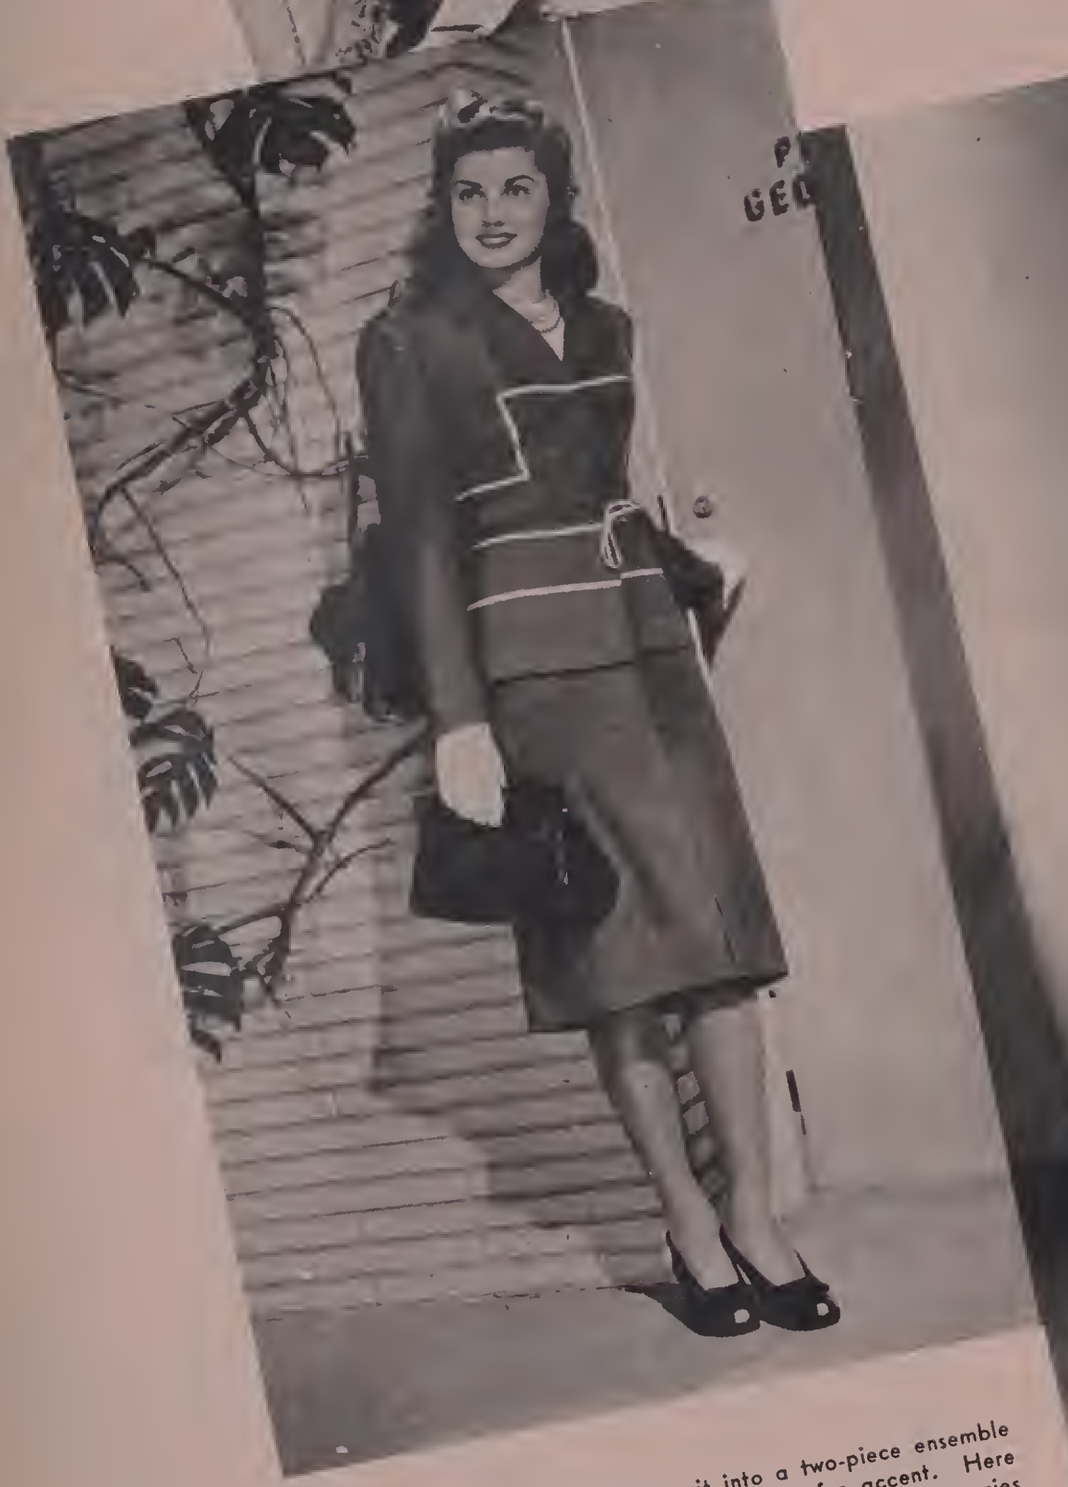
Mail from the fans—which Bonita answers herself. Some job it is, giving advice to all the problems in all those letters!

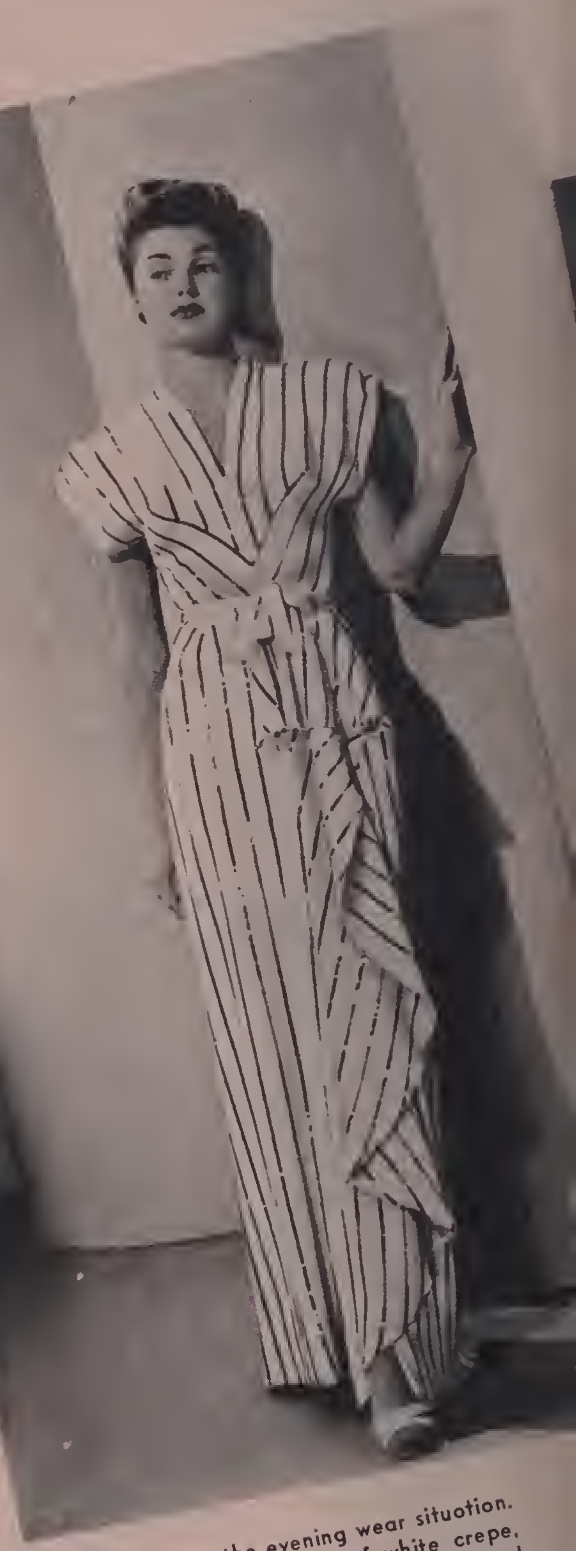
A WONDER WARDROBE



Esther Williams selects outfits that are adaptable to several occasions. To top her suit (for more formality, or warmth, or even both), she adds a finger-length white tweed jacket, with full revers and collar of gray lamb, and a wee bonnet to match.



Irene of MGM fashioned Esther's suit into a two-piece ensemble of light weight wool, with white wool stripes for accent. Here she wears a white dickey and pearls, but colors and accessories can be varied according to mood. The suit itself is adjustable, ready for any daytime wear date and always smartly appropriate.

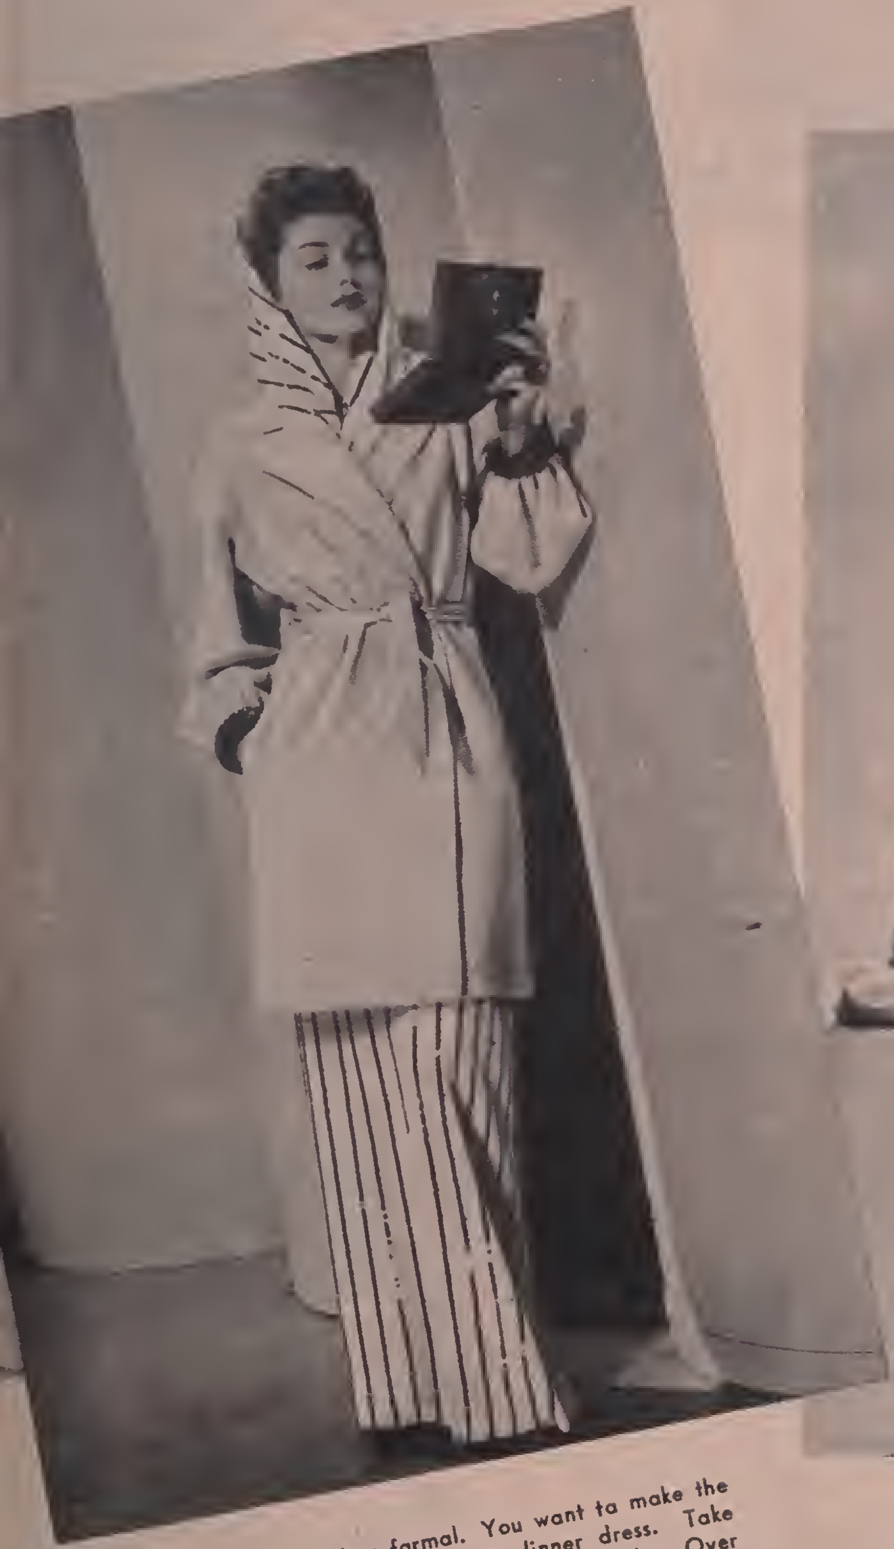


Now to look into the evening wear situation. Esther has this party frock of white crepe, vertically striped with alternate green and red sequins. The front drape falls flatteringly to emphasize the split front effect. But there's the trick! That frill is detachable. On again, off again—just as you wish.

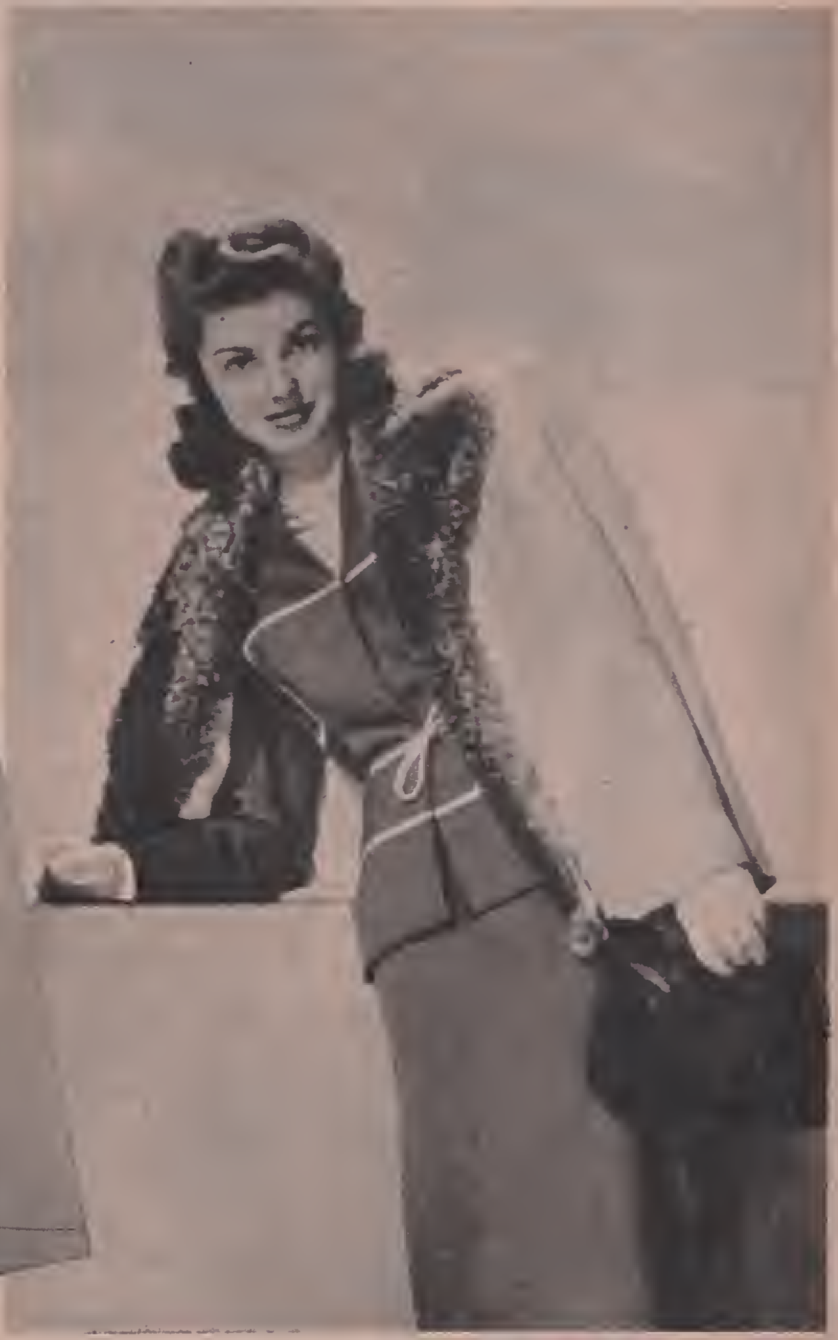
IN TWO SUPER-SMART OUTFITS

Make the most of a minimum—

Look your best but pass that test



Suppose you want to be less formal. You want to make the party dress be a simple but exquisite dinner dress. Take off said frill, use it as a scarf over your locks. Over it all, put your white polo coat (which has many daytime uses). You have green sequin cuffs which you put on the coat sleeves for evening, and presto! The change is made.



Thus a clever girl like Esther Williams always manages to appear dashingly well dressed—and you can, too—without violating any rules. Our government is asking us not to buy any more than we need. That means wise buying, wise planning, careful selection.

MOVIELAND'S 5 Best Pictures of the Month

BY JACK GRANT

UP IN ARMS

(Samuel Goldwyn-RKO)

DANNY KAYE breezes in to establish himself as a solid sender in his first Hollywood picture. The fellow is a terrific entertainer, as he has proved in numerous Broadway musicals, nightclubs and as a singer of distinctive songs on phonograph records. He has a chance to do two of his most favored numbers in "Up In Arms," that parody about the superabundance of screen credits in movies and the yammer to the strains of Rubinstein's "Melody in F" about a draftee's experiences in the Army. Each time he brings down the house, as well as physically knocking himself out. A very funny fellow is Danny Kaye.

He plays a hypochondriac in "Up In Arms," enjoying his imaginary illnesses so intensely that he gets a job as an elevator boy in a physicians' center. He is happy to be in such close contact with the doctors he patronizes. Imagine his surprise when he is found to be physically fit for Army service in the draft. Then darned if he doesn't go out to win a medal for bravery against the Japs. How he blunders into his feat of daring should remain his secret.

There are a lot of riotous laughs in the Samuel Goldwyn farce mostly contributed by Kaye. Dana Andrews plays his buddy in service and their best girls get to go along to war when Dinah Shore and Constance Dowling join the WACs. All of the beauteous Goldwyn Girls are WACs, too Dinah gets the chance to turn loose her soft, sweet and low voice on several songs, best of which is something called "Now I Know." Constance Dowling hardly means anything in her film debut

LIFEBOAT

(20th Century-Fox)

DIRECTOR ALFRED HITCHCOCK has many admirers in Hollywood, but even the most ardent among them had reason to fear that he had undertaken an impossible job in filming "Lifeboat." It was Hitch's own idea to make a picture about a small group of survivors of a ship sinking, who are adrift on the Atlantic in an open boat. John Steinbeck, the novelist, wrote a story for him dealing with the interplay of human emotions under duress, a tale of human strengths, weaknesses and even treachery. The director insisted upon staging the action within the cramped confines of a 26-foot lifeboat, no flashbacks to the previous lives of the nine characters in his cast. He wanted us to meet them as they met one another.

The result is one of the most amazing entertainments of the year, an absorbing drama that sustains interest without pause. Hitchcock, the master of suspense, takes you on a theatrical experience which leaves you limp with excitement.

Headed by Tallulah Bankhead in a dynamic return to the screen, the cast is all-star. Tallu is the elegant international journalist in the plot. "Lifeboat" will launch a new star in John Hodiak who makes a smashing hit as the shipwrecked oiler. The balance of the cast is equally superb: William Bendix is a sailor from Brooklyn; Walter Slezak, a German rescued from the U-boat; Mary Anderson, an appealing American nurse; Henry Hull, an industrialist; Heather Angel, a grieving young mother; Hume Cronyn, a radio operator; and Canada Lee, an upstanding Negro mess steward. It's a film you must see

THE UNINVITED

(Paramount)

THESE ghosts who are "The Uninvited" are taken with full seriousness in the spine-tingling suspenseful picture that has been made of Dorothy Macardle's best-selling novel. Unlike recent screen wraiths, we are not taken to mingle with them in their lives beyond the grave. You don't have to believe in the supernatural to accept their presence in a bleak house overlooking the Dover Cliffs in England. They simply are realistically there as spirits of good and evil, the good one unable to find rest until her dark secret is known by the daughter she has loved and watched over.

As this daughter, Gail Russell impresses as a brilliant new star in Hollywood. She gives a gloriously fresh performance in mighty fast company, playing a charming romance with Ray Milland whose sister is performed by Ruth Hussey. Then there are Donald Crisp and the priceless Cornelia Otis Skinner, to insure a case of unusual abilities in this Charles Brackett production.

The house on the cliffs has long been vacant when Milland and his sister purchase it from the elderly patrician who has determined to keep the secret of its haunting. He tries to prevent the friendship of his granddaughter with the new tenants, but inevitably her problem becomes theirs. One of the spirits is identified as that of her mother; the other a woman who was her father's mistress. What the living do about this frightening pair is legitimately designed to give you that edge-of-the-seat feeling. Its eeriness is dramatically valid, and you should not refuse the invitation to "The Uninvited."

IN OUR TIME

(Warner Bros.)

ACCORDING to the empty promises of the Hitler appeasers, there was to be nothing but peace "In Our Time." Many of us deluded ourselves that these promises would be fulfilled. That was in the fall of 1939 and before the fall of Poland.

Poland is the locale of "In Our Time," which tells of the romantic marriage of an English girl to a titled Polish aristocrat of proud family. Ida Lupino gives a soft, warm performance of the girl, and Paul Henreid is properly dashing as the Count. Their splendid love causes her to brave the wrath of his baronial uncle and introduce modern improvements in the operation of the estate. She is well on the way to pointing a new life for the peasants, who have clung to the medieval manner of existence, when the fury of the Nazi attack breaks in the first bombing of Warsaw. The failure of the counterattack in which motorized panzer divisions annihilated the cavalry is not depicted, merely described. But Poland did not fall without a stout-hearted defense. From that defense comes other promises that can be kept.

Several parts of this story lack the sharp focus in dealing with realities that distinguished such works as "Watch on the Rhine." Yet there is no want of sharpness in the characterizations. Supporting Ida and Henreid, who are really fine, is a superb actor, one Michael Chekhov, whose Uncle Leopold will win your heart. Among others of note are Nazimova, Victor Françen, Mary Boland and Nancy Coleman. Because of their portrayals, your time will not be wasted by "In Our Time."

THE SULLIVANS

(20th Century-Fox)

HERE is the greatest motion picture that has come from the headlines of the current world war. It is not a story of conflict—there is only one battle scene in the whole film. Rather is it a glorious, heartwarming comedy of family life that honestly typifies the spirit of America for which millions are fighting.

Actually all five of the sons of Mom and Pop Sullivan were lost at the same time in the sinking of the cruiser Juneau off Guadalcanal. They died as they had lived—together in the bonds of their proud family ties. And when you are moved to tears by their loss, there will be pride in your weeping—pride in the American heritage their sacrifice allows you to share.

All baptized at the same time, they all slid down the banisters of their modest home in Waterloo, Iowa. They scrapped among themselves, but presented a united front against anyone else who sought a fight. That's what caused them to demand that the Navy assign them all to the same ship.

Al, the youngest Sullivan, was always the one for whom the other brothers had to wait. Yet he was the first to fall in love, marry, and make uncles of the others. The role of Al has a shade the best of the story, a fact capitalized upon by Bobby Driscoll, as the child, and Edward Ryan, as the grown-up. The rest of the brothers are also cleverly performed by screen newcomers, and Anne Baxter delivers a charming portrait of Katherine Mary, the bride. Thomas Mitchell is a splendid Dad, and Selena Royle a priceless Mom. Trudy Marshall is the lovely sister.

RYAN—THE RIP ROARING ADVENTURER

The next time we saw Ryan he was working in "Bombardier." But he wasn't the star. Pat O'Brien was. And there were a host of players with bigger parts than Ryan had.

"They tell me the part isn't big," Ryan said. "But they say it will do things for me."

"Bombardier" didn't do it. Nor did the role of the fighting Irishman in "Behind the Rising Sun," nor the role of the priest in "The Iron Major." It was the smallest bit in his short screen career that did the trick for Bob Ryan.

Producer David Hempstead needed someone to play Fred Astaire's Flying Tiger pal in "The Sky's the Limit." Ryan—by this time he was winding up his affairs preparatory to getting into the army and he didn't care what happened to him in pictures—donned a Flying Tiger uniform, memorized his eight or ten lines of dialogue and did his stint. That, he felt, was that.

It wasn't. "The Sky's the Limit" was previewed. The comment cards poured in and most of them wanted to know who was the guy with the bushy hair and the grin.

It was previewed again, and more comment cards asked the same question. So did Ginger Rogers, who saw the second preview as guest of her former dance partner, Fred Astaire. Miss Rogers had just been handed the "Tender Comrade" script and was on the lookout for a leading man. So the next thing he knew, Ryan was sitting in a hammock on set three asking Ginger to marry him, while the camera put his first screen kiss on film.

That's Ryan's Hollywood story. But it's only a moment in the story of his adventurous, rip-roaring life.

He's a big guy. Six feet three and a quarter inches tall with the sloping shoulders of a boxer and a head of unruly black hair. Six feet isn't tall for a Ryan. His father was six foot four. One of his uncles towered six feet eight above the Chicago sidewalks, where Bob was born November 11, 1909. (We don't mean he was born on the sidewalk—it was in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Ryan that the event occurred.)

Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Ryan immediately began figuring out what their son should do.

"I want him to be a violinist," said Mrs. Ryan.

"In Chicago?" asked the shocked father. "The only thing you can use a violin for in Chicago is to carry a machine gun around in the case. Bob will take boxing lessons, not fiddle lessons."

So Bob took boxing lessons, a thing he has never regretted. In high school, Bob played football and wrote bad poetry. In Dartmouth he played football, became heavyweight boxing champion, and tried to learn to write.

Though Bob's father was a fairly successful contractor, he didn't believe in pampering his son. Bob had to pay part of his way through Dartmouth. He worked summer vacations, first on a dude ranch in Northwest Montana, then in the summer and winter of 1929 as a salesman for cemetery lots.

"My sales argument," he remembers, "was that I was selling something permanent."

He sold plots in graveyards, until the financial world came down around the country's ears. Then nothing would sell, not even something as permanent as a plot six by six by two. So he went back to college, and in his last college vacation he became an unwitting mobster in the Chicago underworld.

"I answered an ad," he says. "An oil man wanted a chauffeur. He took one look at me and said I was it. I ferried him around for two weeks before I discovered he was a bootlegger and that he was taking me along as a bodyguard. I wanted to stay in one piece so I resigned."

Ryan remembers 1932 as the year they handed him a sheepskin and sent him out into a world that was pretty cynical about sheepskins. The market for cemetery lots was nonexistent. The bootlegger who had hired him was in the pokey. The dude ranch business was shot to pieces. But Chicago was extending its sewer system and sandhogs were needed in the tunnels. So Ryan grabbed a pick and shovel and went to work underground. The only thing exciting in that phase of his life was when he saved himself from falling down a seventy-foot shaft by grabbing the side bar of a broken elevator.

It was hard work, dangerous and dull. Ryan got fed up. Two friends came along with a tempting idea. There was still gold in Montana. They knew a man with a placer mine who would let them in on shares. How about it?

"I thought it over," Ryan says. "I thought of being out in the sun and the wind. I thought of seeing hills and open sky again. So away we went, in a car with a top speed of twenty-five miles an hour."

For four months, they toiled for gold, ten hours a day, seven days a week. They lived in a roofless shack and food was scarce. Finally the partners weighed their poke of dust, found they had eight dollars to split three ways. So they crossed the border to Fernie, British Columbia, and had an eight dollar party and then worked their way home.

Things were not good in Chicago. The only job Bob was able to round up was with a loan shark agency. He was a collector. But only for two weeks. Then he split his pay with some of the people he was supposed to collect from and headed for New York to be a newspaperman.

"I couldn't even get a job as an office boy," he recalls. "The streets were lousy with good reporters out of work and there I was, not knowing a box from a byline."

That was a cold winter. Ryan lived in Greenwich Village with two other impoverished boys and they spent their time hunting work. Bob finally found it, with an advertising agency. He became a photograhper's model. He posed for cigarette ads. He posed for alcohol ads.

"I didn't like it," Ryan says. "I didn't like it at all. One of my pals got married. I went to the wedding. I met a goodnatured sea captain at the wedding and next morning I was on his freighter in the black gang, and the freighter was headed for the East coast of Africa."

There was a time in Ryan's life when he thought Eugene O'Neill's plays about life at sea were a trifle overdrawn. That trip in the freighter convinced him O'Neill knew what he was talking about. He worked eight-hour shifts in a temperature of 130 degrees. In Portuguese East Africa he saw native workmen eating raw sheep heads. In a storm in mid-Atlantic he saw a woman try to throw her little boy overboard.

At Trinidad on the long voyage home, a letter from his father caught up with him. Timothy Ryan had a broken leg. There was work for his son to do. So Bob hurried home and became supervisor on a tunnel job for the Chicago drainage canal system.

An accident underground brought Ryan back to the surface of the earth for good. Four men were killed when a pick hit an unexploded dynamite charge. He got a supervisor's job on a street paving project. He did some thinking, a whole lot of thinking. It occurred to him suddenly that he had been marking time most of his life, that what he wanted to do was act and write and direct.

How does a man who knows nothing about the theater go about getting a job? That was the question facing Bob Ryan. His first gesture was talking to the principal of a girl's school into letting him direct "Dear Brutus." The next was studying under Edward Boyle, noted Chicago teacher.

Meanwhile, he had saved $300 and along came another friend with another proposition. The friend wanted money for an oil well being drilled in Michigan.

For once, the money put into an oil well by an amateur investor paid out. "The next thing I knew," Bob says, "the well came in and I was getting $200 a month. I was rich. So I headed west to Hollywood and enrolled in the Reinhardt workshop."

He studied acting, voice, theater history, fencing, designing. He even became a fair ballet dancer. He remembers his term at the workshop fondly. There it was that he met Jessica Cadwalader. She's a blonde with blue eyes and a figure that would win any Miss America contest. She started out to be an actress, wound up by writing a play, "Dark Corner," that was produced this year. A month after she and Bob met, they agreed to love, honor and obey each other, and they have had no trouble doing exactly that ever since.

It was in March, 1939, that the Ryans were married. They had a hundred dollars and a lot of hopes. The hundred dollars gave out and Corey Ford came to the rescue with his $250 loan.

"This is a precarious business, kid," Ford wrote when he sent Ryan the money. "Keep it until you're sure."

Ryan wasn't sure for quite a while. He worked as part time assistant director to Reinhardt. He picked up a dollar a lesson from Hollywood kids who wanted to learn to box. He made his professional debut as an actor in "Too Many Husbands" at the Belasco Theater in Los Angeles and next day read one review which said: "We understand Mr. Ryan used to be a boxer. Last night he talked as though he had forgotten to take his mouthpiece out."

Eventually, all aspiring actors head for New York. The Ryans did. They thumbed a ride east and landed in Dennis, Mass. There is a famous summer theater in Dennis—the Cape Playhouse—and there it was that Ryan appeared in support of Luise Rainer in "A Kiss For Cinderella."

"I thought it was just one of those jobs," says Ryan. "It wasn't. It got me my break."

For Miss Rainer was married to Clifford Odets and Odets had written a play called "Clash By Night"—and Odets, Tallulah Bankhead and Producer Billy Rose were looking for a juvenile.

"Bob is it," said Miss Rainer.

Odets, Bankhead and Rose agreed. So Ryan went into "Clash By Night." Pare Lorentz saw it and Ryan for "Name, Age and Occupation."

Which brings us right back to where we started, with Corey Ford and the two hundred and fifty bucks.

The day Ginger Rogers tagged Ryan for "Tender Comrade" Ryan again wrote out a check for $250 and mailed it to Ford with this note: "This time I'm really sure."

"Apparently Corey believes me," Ryan says. "Anyway he cashed the check. Maybe that's a good sign. Or maybe it's because my next employer is Uncle Sam—a guy who's to be trusted."

Letter FROM A BOY IN THE SERVICE

Seems funny writing to a fan magazine (I used to write for pictures), but the aftermath of a tough invasion and tough battle for an island, the fact that pomegranates within reach and grapes a few feet away are inviting, all tend to mellow my mood. So strictly as a fan, I am writing you of a show that came to us doggies of the infantry in Sicily not too far from Mt. Etna.

Bob Hope and Al Jolson both staged a hit performance for the 1st Infantry Division. You may have heard of us—the 1st is a fighting outfit and seldom do we get the chance the dogfaces do back in the States to enjoy a good show.

It was shortly after the fall of Massarina that Hope visited us, but what I wanted to write about was Adolphe Menjou and Anna Lee. Anna made two appearances for the 16th Inf. Regiment—that's my outfit. Menjou held an unusual Information Please routine—he invited doggies to fire any questions of Hollywood at him. They fired, he fired right back.

Anna caused a riot and brought forth a salvo of hurrahs when she got a coy doggie on the improvised stage and invited him to kiss her. He did—on the cheek—the same doggie that knocked out a sniper when we were entering Treina. That's what Hollywood does to a combat line infantryman.

By the way, if this letter wins any kind of prize, don't send me money because it's useless where we are. Send me a box of good Havana cigars.

Cpl. Samuel Fuller,
Reg. Hdq., 16th Infantry
A.P.O. 1, c/a Postmaster
New York City.

(Editor's Note: Ten dollars worth of cigars and our thanks are already en route to Cpl. Fuller.)

Beginner Earns $1,819

"Today I received a check for $165 for a story. Another I sold for $34. Not bad for a beginner, is it? The other day I counted up just how much I have made previously. It amounted to $1,620.00."—MRS. L. L. GRAY, 579 E. McHarg Ave., Stamford, Texas.

Why Can't You Write?

It's much simpler than you think!

SO many people with the "germ" of writing in them simply can't get started. They suffer from inertia. Or they set up imaginary barriers to taking the first step.

Many are convinced the field is confined to persons gifted with a genius for writing.

Few realize that the great bulk of commercial writing is done by so-called "unknowns." Not only do these thousands of men and women produce most of the fiction published, but countless articles on school and social matters, business, household affairs, fashions, human interest stories, gardening, decorating, travels and war activities, as well.

Such material is in constant demand. Every week thousands of checks for $25, $50 and $100 go out to writers whose latent ability was perhaps no greater than yours.

The Practical Method

Newspaper work demonstrates that the way to learn to write is by writing! Newspaper copy desk editors waste no time on theories or ancient classics. The story is the thing. Every copy "cub" goes through the course of practical criticism—a training that turns out more successful authors than any other experience.

That is why Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on the Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. And upon the very same kind of actual assignments given daily to metropolitan reporters. Thus you learn by doing, not by studying the individual styles of model authors.

Each week your work is analyzed constructively by practical writers. Gradually they help to clarify your own distinctive style. Writing soon becomes easy, absorbing. Profitable, too, as you gain the "professional" touch that gets your material accepted by editors. Above all, you can see constant progress week by week as your faults are corrected and your writing ability grows.

Have You Natural Ability?

Our Writing Aptitude Test will reveal whether or not you have natural talent for writing. It will analyze your powers of observation, your imagination and dramatic instinct. You'll enjoy taking this test. There is no cost or obligation. Simply mail the coupon below, today. Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. (Founded 1925) of Duffy's Tavern is moving east for thirteen weeks, I would like to rent my palatious home in Bel-Air. I got a tennis court, swimming pool, a lawn so adjacent one may engage in cricket, croquet, polo (if played with Shetland ponies) and other sports. I got a victory garden, fruit trees—oranges, lemons, limes, avacarbons and them Mexican peaches. The house itself has a three-car garage, two servants rooms, three large bedrooms, with dressing rooms and separate bath, an office, a radio room, a powder room and a large living room with one of Steinway's grand pianos. Tremendous kitchen, dining room, etc., to say nothing of liberry with a vanishing bar and a game room with a pool table and pingpong table. Here is a chance for a banker or a business tycoon to live like a wealthy bartender for three months, providing he will be kind to the furniture, the carpets, the servants and the gardener. Call Ed "Archie" Gardner for appointment, Br. 04597. This ain't kiddin'."

They rented the house after showing it to three people, and had sixty calls begging to rent the house.

MOVING OUT TO THE VALLEY

Marwyck has been sold again. Originally, the large ranch in San Fernando Valley belonged jointly to Barbara Stanwyck and Mrs. Zeppo Marx. It was a horse ranch and one of the show places in California. They finally gave it up as a bad business venture and sold it to Venita Oakie, Jack's wife. She raised Afghan hounds.

She gave it up and now Mary Pickford and the dress designer Adrian have purchased it. There are two beautiful homes on the place, so Adrian has moved his wife, Janet Gaynor, and his little son, Robin, out there. Mary and Buddy plan to move out there this summer with their adopted children. They are going to farm the place, and we wonder if all the hands are going to wear Adrian creations.

ALSOP'S FABLES, WITH MUSIC

Those singing commercials you hear on the radio are the brain children of Carleton Alsop, husband of Martha Scott. Alsop originated them three years ago when he was a radio executive in New York. Martha thinks they are wonderful and even sings some of them.

Gary Cooper, fourteen pounds lighter since his overseas trip, chats with Joan Leslie at Warner Bros.' big Army-Navy party.

BLONDELL GOES TO BROADWAY

Alas, there's another parting in Hollywood of two very nice people, Joan Blondell and Dick Powell. They have been married for eight years, and for a considerable amount of them there was a very happy home, what with the two children.

For once, it can't be blamed on that old "two careers" alibi. In fact, the separation can more nearly be blamed on the lack of their two careers.

When Joan and Dick married, they were both under contract to Warner's, both at the peak. Each had had one unhappy marriage. Both of them very much wanted to settle down to be blissful ever after. You never saw two more delighted people than when their daughter was born.

When Dick didn't re-sign with Warners and when he decided, unwisely in my very personal opinion, that he didn't want to sing on screen anymore, it was, in a way, the beginning of the end of the romance. An actor simply must act to be happy.

Not very long after, Joan's career began to get sparse. She worked more often than Dick did, but still not enough to occupy all the energies of a girl who'd known the spotlight since childhood.

While Dick staged a recent mild comeback at Paramount, Joan has been East hunting for a really good Broadway show.

The parting is not one of those "friendly" ones.

A NEW MARRIAGE FOR VIDOR

But, thank heaven, Cupid doesn't get discouraged in our town.

By the time you read this, unless something goes surprisingly awry, Evelyn Keyes will be Mrs. Charles (director) Vidor. She is a distinctive, lovely girl, this Evelyn, and has been deeply in love with Charles Vidor practically from the day of their first meeting.

The obstacle to their marriage, long before this, was the fact that Vidor was married to the silent star, Karen Morley. The divorce became final in March.

JUST BACK FROM THE SOUTH PACIFIC

I had the privilege of talking with Gary Cooper, Una Merkel and Phyllis Brooks a few days after they returned from their tour of the South Pacific war front.

I never saw three so different people so deeply moved. None of them was either funny or dramatic about the experience, but all of them—and this goes for Gary, too—couldn't talk about our boys at all except with tears in their eyes.

Coop said, his voice ragged with sincerity, "I don't want any publicity on this, but you can do me a service. You get around and see lots of players. You tell every actor and actress you see that to go out and play for our troops is a privilege."

Una said, "Oh, Ruth, when you see those boys in those steaming jungles, and all they want you to sing is 'White Christmas' . . . oh!"

She had gone to sick bay to get a toenail treated. The toenail had been torn nearly off, when she'd been dragged hastily into a slit trench as Tojo flew over.

The doctor was a dignified man of about thirty-five, but as she removed her heavy jungle boot, her thick stocking, his hands began to shake. His face got white and he finally said, "I'm so sorry, Miss Merkel, but I'll have to call someone else to treat you."

Una looked at him wide-eyed.

He said, "You see I haven't seen a white woman for eighteen months."

WHAT'S YOUR RANK, DRIVER?

Not long ago, Maureen O'Hara was on her way to a party. She saw a lonely looking uniformed man standing on a corner and asked him if he would like to go with her. The guy snapped up the chance.

He was so funny and joined in so nicely that he practically made the party. His uniform was quite handsome, but not familiar to the guests, so finally someone asked him what branch of the service he was in.

He said, "I'm not a soldier, I'm a Greyhound Bus Driver."

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

. . . created especially for this purpose—QUEST* POWDER—soft, soothing, safe. It's the Kotex* Deodorant, approved by the Kotex laboratories. Being unscented, it doesn't merely cover up one odor with another. Quest Powder destroys napkin odor completely. It's your sure way to avoid offending. Many months' supply, only 35c.

RITA'D RATHER BE WITH ORSON

The vivid romance that brought together Rita Hayworth and Orson Welles has been made to burn the brighter by their marriage. Rita, that most unusual combination of beauty and genuine sweetness, has worked ever since girlhood. Orson, as an infant prodigy, has also been before the public for a disproportionate amount of his twenty-eight years. Therefore, you know it's a very real love when two such people renounce personal ambition merely to be with one another.

Orson could have gone to London to star in a great British production of "War and Peace." He turned it down because Rita wouldn't be able to be with him. Rita could, at this moment, have anything her gentle heart desires from any studio, with her home studio, Columbia, pulling out its hair and its bankroll trying to keep her constantly in front of a camera. But Rita has run away from all the offers, to be in the East with Orson. Frantic phone calls and wires mean nothing to her. She doesn't even bother to answer them. She'll return to Hollywood when Orson returns, not before.

The Hollywood whispers have it that the stork may be hovering over Rita these days, but so far that is not officially confirmed. What a wonder child that would be! You remember the old crack when somebody discussed with the great Shaw his considering having a child with Isadora Duncan. Said Shaw, "But suppose it got her brains and my body?"

With Orson and Rita, whatever the inheritance, you'd still have an amazing personality.

DEPRESSED—BUT DETERMINED

Alan Ladd is determined to go overseas to entertain the soldiers. He feels deeply depressed over his return to civilian life and spends much time in the Hollywood Canteen. Doctors gave him six months to get back to normal health, and Paramount had better get their pictures done—because the quiet Ladd always does what he makes up his mind to do. Cute little Susie will be with him. They are working up an act together.

NEAR-FIGHT DEPARTMENT

When Mary Martin went east to appear in the Broadway hit, "One Touch of Venus," she rented her little bandbox of a home to Judy Garland.

First blows came when Mary nearly returned to the Coast and asked Judy to vacate. What with the housing shortage and a lease, Miss Garland declined. This was settled when Mary's show clicked and she didn't return.

But next, Mary started to decorate a New York apartment and decided she must have twelve Holbein prints from her Hollywood house. Judy declined to send them. Mary insisted. Judy declined, said Mary could have anything else in the house but not those prints. Mary said she wanted them.

This was all very dignified but firm on each side. Finally, M-G-M came to the rescue in the shape of Ed Willis, head decorator for the studio. He sent Judy one dozen exquisitely framed Victoria flower prints that exactly fitted the wall space.

So Judy sent Mary the Holbeins and everything is fine.

AH, NOW AIN'T THAT SWEET!

Pat O'Brien celebrated his birthday by presenting Mrs. Pat with a precious and unique gift—a pair of earrings in which were set, like cameos, the profiled images of their daughters, Mavourneen and Sean. Mrs. O'Brien wears the portrait of Mavourneen on one lobe and Sean on the other.

A HUNCH HE CAN'T EXPLAIN

The big guy known as Victor McLaglen, Provost Marshal of Bagdad, India, sat in his sparsely furnished, clay-walled office. It was just shortly after the armistice of World War I. The issue at hand was the trial of a frightened native boy, accused of theft. When the Marshal had heard all the evidence, he acquitted the lad, stating there was insufficient testimony to prove his guilt. The boy fell upon his knees and reverently stroked the Provost's boot. He rushed from the office to return in a few short moments with a hand-sized hunk of elephant hide and tossed it on the Provost's desk. "This is all I have to thank you—but it will bring you great luck."

Through his many adventuring years, Victor McLaglen carried the elephant hide among his trappings, more from sentiment than superstition.

It was late in 1943. Twentieth Century-Fox's he-man star had completed his newest picture, "Tampico," and was in his dressing room packing letters and papers into a case to take to his ranch in the north. He came across the small square of hide, tucked away in the binding of a book. Grinning in memory of its presentation, Vic crammed it into his pocket.

A few minutes later, Vic was stepping into his car to take off for the three hundred mile drive to his northern ranch, when the production department notified him he'd have to wait over for one additional scene. Vic told his driver to proceed with the car, and he'd take a plane north the following morning. Three hours later, the news came—Vic's car had plunged into a ditch. The driver was killed, the car completely demolished. The native boy's "great luck" promise to Vic McLaglen had been grimly fulfilled—twenty-three years later.

SOMETHING TO TELL ABOUT!

Ida Lupino was like a school girl all month, carrying that newspaper clipping of Capt. Louis Hayward's action under fire with the marines at Tarawa, around with her everywhere she went, and proudly displaying it for friends to read.

She and Eddie Albert's mother (Eddie was with one of the naval units covering the marines' landing) had never met before, but the morning that news story broke on Louis and Eddie, Ida went directly to Mrs. Albert's home and the two women got together for hours afterward to chat about "their boys" and compare letters and photographs they'd each received.

Most of us in Hollywood still can't visualize the super-sensitive, highly idealistic actor Louis Hayward slugging it out with the marines in the toughest battle of their history. Yet thus it is.

GAGS 'N GOSSIP STUFF

Walter Pidgeon appears all through "Madame Curie" wearing a very handsome beard. In all the newspaper advertisements and billboard displays, however, he is clean shaven. Metro pondered for days about this and decided the bobby-sock trade would stay away in droves if they let them know, before they got into the theaters, that their idol wore whiskers. . . . Alfred Hichcock lost one hundred pounds. Recently when he was in London a wag said, "We never knew the food shortage was so bad in America." . . . Report that Clark Gable and Virginia Bruce were engaged drew them apart in a hurry and Clark's now seeing almost daily the beauteous Kay Williams, who used to be married to the South American millionaire Macacco. . . . Irene Dunne, who has a new birth of success with "A Guy Named Joe" and "The White Cliffs of Dover," is in private life playing second fiddle to her daughter, Mary Frances, aged about ten. Mary Frances is playing Snow White in her school play and mommy has to coach her. . . . Mickey Rooney is always late for his dates. Girls have always waited, until little June Haver waited twenty minutes, called another boy and went out. Mickey was burned, but on time the next time she gave him a date.

Expectantly yours! Betty Grable dines with hubby Harry James at the Palladium.

Lt. Comdr. Bob Montgomery, in Hollywood on furlough—with his pal, George Murphy.

BORO PHENO FORM

ELLA RAINES

Ken Trout, today Captain Kenneth Trout, U. S. Army Air Corps pilot, a hero who has won the Distinguished Flying Cross, Air Medal and Presidential Citation.

At the conclusion of her junior year, Ella's parents gave her permission to spend the summer in Hollywood, to do Little Theater parts and even a scrap of extra work if it should come her way.

Ella selected a small but charming apartment in the heart of Hollywood. For company, she shared it with a chum, Virginia Brooker, whom she had known for a long time and who had had considerable success as a comedienne.

"The summer went by terribly fast," Ella says. "There were plenty of dates, and there was plenty of work to do, too. Before we knew it, the summer was over, and Labor Day was at hand. We'd soon have to break up our little home. I was going back to the University to graduate, then try for a career on the stage. So we planned a really big clambake for that final holiday."

The fateful Labor Day started out with great promise. Virginia, who did most of the cooking, went out early to shop for a ham that was to be the main dish of the big dinner they planned. Ella headed for the beach for a swim, taking with her a large quantity of sunburn lotion.

"I returned home later, and when I found that Virginia was still out, I decided to start the ham," Ella relates. "I reached into the oven with a match. There was a horrible explosion and flames enveloped me. I was thrown backward, my clothing and hair on fire."

With her bare hands, Ella beat out the flames before she fainted. Neighbors summoned the fire department and an ambulance. It was several days later in the hospital that Ella realized she was nearly blinded, that her hair had been burned an inch and a half back on her head, and that her eyebrows and eyelashes were gone. There were first and second degree burns all over her face. She struggled to see, but when she focused her eyes everything blurred.

"The shock was so great that physical pain didn't set in immediately. In those first horrible moments of realization, I had only one prayer; no matter how scarred I was, let me recover my sight.

"It seems that when I was placed in the ambulance, the first thing I had done was to put my hand to my cheek. The skin had stuck to it! Doctors told me later that the only thing which saved me from permanent tissue scars was the greasy sunburn lotion still left on my skin from the beach."

So now she lay in a hospital, her face enclosed in a mask. Her hands were "all wrapped up, until I looked as if I had on boxing gloves." She was fed through a glass straw, and the faces of her nurses, her parents and her friends were all the same frightening blur. There was nothing left for her but thought and prayer. All her thoughts became prayers and she learned humility from them. She looked back over the short span of her life and realized that she had truly been very, very lucky, and that she had not only taken this luck for granted, but that she had preened on it and credited herself with being much more clever than she really was. Now all the things which she had taken for granted had been taken away from her—her looks, her sight, her opportunity for a dramatic career, probably love itself.

"I thought about so many things," Ella says. "I thought about my childhood in Snoqualmie Falls, of fishing in the brook which ran by our home there, of swimming in the Samamish Lake, of skiing at Summit, Wash., and at Mt. Rainier. I'd always been active, and I loved outdoor life. Without my sight, nothing would ever be the same again.

"But, more than that, I thought of the years I'd spent trying to learn to sing and act, the friends I had had on the campus at the University, and of Ken, and what he would say when he found that I was scarred for life and probably partially blind."

Time dragged by, slowly, fearfully, until that wonderful day when she could drop the mask. But even then, Ella was covered with what they called "patch" bandages. Even then, she still had no assurance of recovery.

"Only after I had lost so many things, did they become valuable," she declares. "The little things I had always taken for granted became really important. I realized that I hadn't taken full advantage of all the opportunities which were afforded me, and if I ever had them again I'd make full use of them, and be grateful for them. I pledged myself to accept them as gifts from Heaven and to use them humbly."

Slowly the autumn months went by. Winter came and Christmas and New Year's. Ella's strength returned and with it her vision. By spring, when she went back to the University campus, she was quite a different girl from what she had been. Mentally, she had acquired humility and courage. Physically, she was badly marked.

"Where once I had been elected one of the six prettiest girls on the campus," she recalls, "now I was ugly. I had only part of my hair. I had no eyebrows or eyelashes. For a while I wore the bandages. Then, when they were removed finally, I had a large red mark on my right cheek where my hand had touched it that awful day.

"I began developing an inferiority complex and I had to fight it every minute. I soon found out who my real friends were—those who cared for me sincerely and liked me for what good, sound human traits I had. Yet, bitterly, I discovered that they were few and far between. The majority, the fair weather friends, took one look at me and then quickly looked away.

"Fortunately, I was far from Ken and he couldn't see me as I was then. He was stationed at Randolph Field, in Texas, learning how to be a flier, and when he came home on a visit he could see no trace of the accident."

Before another semester rolled around, Ella's hair, eyebrows and eyelashes grew out again.

"I thought I'd never get rid of that last red blotch," Ella says, "but it finally disappeared. It is apparent now only after I've taken a very hot shower. But during that lonely year at college, I came upon an amazing thing. Bit by bit I discovered I'd found a new type of happiness. I learned to be humble and tolerant. I also learned to appreciate the real things of life. I learned to overlook the handicaps of others.

"Through the many unhappy hours of uncertainty and dread, I gained an appreciation and sensitivity that I would never have discovered otherwise, not only in regard to acting, but toward people. I began to appreciate their circumstances and their handicaps. In other words, I stopped being self-centered. I even forgot my self pity. Almost without being aware of it, I found myself, through others, being happy again. When I thought of someone like Virginia Brooker being so constant in her kindness to me when I was more than a thousand miles from my home and my parents after that accident, I knew the depths of human devotion. It is what made an actress of me."

Of course, it's interesting to conjecture what would have happened had those marks not disappeared. Undoubtedly, Ella Raines today wouldn't occupy the envied position on the screen she does, had they remained to haunt her ever after. And would she be the happy wife she is today?

One wonders. A man who has won the distinction Captain Trout has earned in the field, however, wouldn't be of the caliber not to have gone through with the marrage, however marked his bride-to-be might appear—that is, if Ella herself would have agreed to the marriage.

Ella's wedding was an unexpected, hurried occurence. An emergency ceremony, you might say.

Two days before graduation from the University of Washington, with Ella primed for this long-awaited event, she received a wire from Ken, in West Palm Beach, Florida, where he now was stationed. He wanted to know if they couldn't be wed, immediately. He was about to go overseas, and asked if she wouldn't fly down at once from Seattle for the ceremony.

Forgetting everything but that the man she loved was about to leave the country, and that she might never see him again, Ella hopped a plane next day—the day before the graduation she had looked forward to all the years of her college life—and without a thought but of Ken, raced to his side, to be married in a simple ceremony at West Palm Beach.

They were together eight days before Ken flew out for active service on the far-off war front—eight days of delirious happiness for Ella, the happiest eight days of her life. Then her love flew away, and she joined the ranks of those other million wives whose husbands are away to the wars.

to do with them or how to spend them."

Mr. and Mrs. Joe Pasternak occasionally take Frances to a play, dinner or a picture, but Vanna Gay is too new a responsibility for her mother to enjoy being away from her.

Ann Sothern had been married only three weeks when husband Robert Sterling joined his outfit. She asked her sister to live with her, but her sister's husband was unexpectedly released from the army. So now Ann lives alone, and loathes it.

Ann is fully occupied while making pictures, but when not working she is sure she would go mad if she spent every night in her lonely house. Bob likes to hear that she is out with old friends like the Ray Millands or the Jack Bennys. Ann does not go 'out on twosome dates, but if her hosts invite a serviceman as an extra guest, Ann is very willing to act as bridge or dinner partner.

"Occasionally, as I've always done, I go shopping with Ray when he wants advice on surprises for his wife," she confesses. "I am besieged by my married friends for help on this or that ever since Bob left, and I'm beginning to suspect a conspiracy to keep me busy. They know it will please Bob, and it's a little more personal than my war work."

Sergeant Lou Bush is stationed near enough to wife Janet Blair that they see each other every week-end. The problem of an escort has not therefore arisen, but Janet is certain that she will never date anyone while he is away.

Janet is fortunate in that her mother and sister are visiting her. She's working hard at pictures, army shows and bond tours, and in spare time takes dancing and singing lessons.

"If there was a long ominous silence in my V-mail, once Lou was overseas," she says, "and my mind insisted on playing tricks such as: 'Is he rocking about on a rubber boat?', 'Has he forgotten me?', 'Is he alive?', 'Is he hurt?', 'Is he ill?', 'Will I ever see him again?'—as the best regulated mind will, after a long silence from the man you love—at least I can work at my dancing until I exhaust myself physically."

She is in strong disagreement with Michele Morgan on the subject of dancing. "If I were serving at the Canteen or on a bond selling tour and was asked to dance with service men, I'd do so at once. My husband would think less of me if I refused. When we go out here, we dance with other partners—so what's the difference? He knows all my thoughts are his.

"Perhaps it's because we are both so young that we have a new slant on what's important, but we can't see why marrying should suddenly make it wrong for me to dance with the men who are fighting for our country."

In the nearly two years of Gene Raymond's war service, Jeanette MacDonald has seen him only forty-one days. Some were snatched hours when they happened to be in the same towns, she on a concert tour or doing

"Romeo and Juliet," he making military inspections, so they were not full days.

"I haven't gone out on dates with other men, though I would do so if I wished, but I do go to dinners or shows with groups of friends. I go to cocktail parties or informal affairs, too. While Gene was in England he was invited to many famous places and I know I was always eager to hear about the people he met and what he thought of them, and he's just as eager to hear about those I see here.

"He worries if I stay at home too much. He thinks I am too apt to stay in and writes my friends urging that they see I go out! Gene is growing and developing in his new world; I cannot afford to stagnate. I mustn't ask my man to come back—I must be there to meet him.

"One thing that probably bothers a lot of other service couples, we've solved—the telephone problem. When Gene is in this country and wishes to call me, he puts in a call in the morning stating the time he wishes to talk. The operator rings me and I arrange to be there to take the call, or tell the operator where to reach me. Nothing is more disheartening than to sit night after night waiting for a call that doesn't come. And to my mind, no woman has a right to sit back, beautiful and cherished, and not do her share of war work."

Barbara Stanwyck never misses dinner with her son. She doesn't go out on dates, but she never was a girl to whom a "date" meant much before she married Robert Taylor.

"Perhaps if a girl is newly married and hasn't had the opportunity of sharing joys and troubles and thus creating a background of understanding, she should take care not to add to her soldier husband's worries by engaging in a social whirl," she concedes. "But a girl who has been happily married for a few years should run no risk of being misunderstood by her husband.

"He won't expect her to stop loving him because he's away. He knows she belongs to him and will keep faith, but he realizes also that this is no time for her to sit at home idle. If she can do her bit by knitting or making bandages at home, that may be the best way for her—but if she can help her country by going on bond tours, camp shows, working at the Canteen and the Blood Bank, he expects that of her as a matter of course."

Capt. Louis Hayward, U.S.M.C., and Ida Lupino have a large group of friends of every age, married and single, and his absence didn't break up the group that drifts in and out of Ida's cottage just as they used to do at Brentwood. Her mother lives with Ida and her sister is often there.

Ida has, as always, a hundred irons in the fire. She's making pictures, she's writing plays, she's composing music, she's arranging and rehearsing skits for camp shows, she's studying scripts, reading plays she might do, writing reams to Louis about whatever it was she was doing last, demanding his opinions and advice. She gives parties—usually the same day they occurred to her—and goes to dinners, shows or parties if she remembers she was asked in time to get there.

"If Louis heard that I was sitting nun-like inside four walls while he was fighting, he'd think I'd taken leave of my senses," she observes. "Louis and I have a complete understanding. There isn't a jealous bone in his body. Louis knows I wouldn't take a second look at any other man on earth. And by the way, I think it's very bad psychology to encourage the idea of jealousy. It's a poison in the mind.

"I've always worked—I love it—and I'm frightfully fortunate that I have work to do at this time. While your husband's at war, work, wear yourself out at it rather than worry. Really, I can't think it matters whether you're amused or not!"

On the other hand, Brenda Joyce's husband, Owen Ward, arranged with a close friend of his—a doctor—to accompany his pretty wife whenever she needs an escort. This is a sort of "brother" relationship and makes Owen feel easier about Brenda when she must make appearances at night.

"Whenever I'm asked to go out on USO camp shows or war bond tours," Brenda told me. "And when I'm home I have the baby and the apartment to care for.

"Whenever I'm marketing or shopping, I keep an eye out for gadgets or unrationed items of special food to send Owen. I cut out magazine articles that interest me, save new books that appeal to me. As often as I can, I make up small packages for him and put in whatever I've collected, with late pictures of the baby. We think it brings us closer. And of course, I simply live for the day he'll come home!"

Cobina Wright, Jr., is married to Lt. Palmer Beaudette, who is now in Australia. Cobina's baby is very young and she's an enthusiastic parent.

"Dinah Shore Montgomery is one of my best friends," Cobina explains, "and with both our soldier husbands gone, we pal around together. Dinah comes to my house and helps me with the baby and I take my son to her house.

"Recently we decided we should occupy ourselves profitably, or we'd degenerate into housewives with no brains—so we now have a coach and are learning to speak Spanish."

SO there you have it—but one thing I believe is that war, with its separations, has actually brought husbands and wives more close in spirit.

At least, I know that's true in Hollywood.

THIS WAS HOLLYWOOD

By JANE WILKIE

A YEAR AGO THIS MONTH:

Ginger Rogers married Jack Briggs. . . . Henry Fonda's last picture before joining the Navy, "The Immortal Sergeant," was best picture of the month. . . . Lana Turner and Betty Grable were top pin-up girls, with the much-photographed Jane Russell running third. . . . Judy Garland and Dave Rose had their final split-up. . . . William Powell and Diana Lewis celebrated their third wedding anniversary. . . . Maria Montez hadn't met Pierre Aumont and was sitting at home evenings . . . John Howard was carrying a torch for Hedy Lamarr, who was doing ditto for George Montgomery. . . . Bette Davis and Miriam Hopkins were glaring at each other between and during scenes of "Old Acquaintance."

FIVE YEARS AGO THIS MONTH:

Hollywood was laying odds that Barbara Stanwyck wouldn't marry Bob Taylor, but that Merle Oberon would wed Alexander Korda. . . . David Selznick discovered Vivien Leigh, and letters poured in from all over the country protesting against her final selection for the role of Scarlett. . . . Cary Grant romancing with Phyllis Brooks. . . . "Made For Each Other," starring Carole Lombard and Jimmy Stewart, ran neck and neck with "Idiot's Delight" for honors of best picture of the month. . . . Betty Grable and Jackie Coogan were squabbling and Hollywood waited for a divorce. . . . Laurence Olivier came to America to play Heathcliff in "Wuthering Heights." . . . Jane Wyman and Jerry Wald were inseparable. . . . Jeanette McDonald was voted Queen of the Movies by leading newspapers, and Ty Power won laurels as King. Ty was considered the wolf of the town, having gone with Sonja Henie, Loretta Young, Janet Gaynor and Annabella. . . . The hottest rumor in movieland was that Garbo had up and married Stokowski. With or without him, she was studying the script of "Madame Curie," which M-G-M was planning to produce immediately. . . . Fifty-two leading stars sent a petition to the President and Congress of the United States, protesting actions of Nazi Germany and asking that economic relations between our country and Germany be severed "until such time as Germany is willing to re-enter the family of nations in accordance with the humane principles of international law and universal freedom."

TEN YEARS AGO THIS MONTH:

Virginia Bruce, the fourth Mrs. John Gilbert, left handsome Jack after an unsuccessful try at wedded bliss. . . . Clark Gable appeared in "It Happened One Night," whereupon the critics remarked, "he blossoms as an actor instead of being a pawn for glittering women stars." . . . Garbo had disappeared again. . . . An English star, Madeleine Carroll came to Hollywood "to make just one picture." . . . Gary Cooper and Veronica Balfe were newlyweds. . . . Charlotte Henry drew raves for her performance in "Alice in Wonderland." . . . Rudy Vallee, just divorced from Fay Webb, described the girl of his vagabond dreams. Said Rudy, "She must not be too young. A wife of twenty-five would be all right for me." . . . Dolores Del Rio was shocked at American girls "because they are so fickle and have unbreakable hearts." . . . Joel McCrea and Frances Dee were expecting their first baby. . . . Love Affairs of the Month were Ann Sothern-Roger Pryor, Carole Lombard - George Raft, Kay Francis-Bill Powell.

Claudette Colbert and Clark Gable in "It Happened One Night." They both received Academy Awards—which hasn't happened since, for stars acting in the same picture.

JIM BROWN

clearly what an acting career entailed, but he knew what he wanted out of it and he was prepared to put into it every ounce of energy and ambition that he possessed. Actually, this was the force of love working one of its miracles, expressing itself in terms of ambition, but Jim didn't know that then.

The first few weeks on location in Florida with the "Air Force" company were trying. He was still floundering, the waiting still irked him and he fretted at being separated from Verna when he didn't seem to be doing anything. People misinterpreted his restlessness and thought he was indifferent. Then one day, when the picture was about half finished, Jim learned that he was going to be a father.

"That scared me stiff," he shudders. "I knew that I had to make good immediately. I realized that this was the first real job I'd ever had and that I had to make it go. I couldn't afford any more to take time off to feel sorry for myself if things didn't go to suit me or if I had an 'off day.' I couldn't afford to have my pride injured, no matter what happened. All I could afford to do now was to try to learn my business—and learn it well."

He was still more frightened when the doctor told him, gravely, that Verna really shouldn't try to have a baby at all. "Oh, that was a bad time!" he says, talking about it now.

One of the handicaps was that nothing in his early life had prepared Jim for the tempo of the life and the career in which he found himself in Hollywood.

He had been born in the little town of Desdemona, Texas, and the family moved to Waco while he was still an infant. His father is Floyd E. Brown, an oil salesman. He attended Waco public schools, played the trumpet and the French horn in high school orchestras, and went on to Schreiner Military Institute where he began to create a sensation in local tennis circles. Thence to two years at Baylor University, where he distinguished himself at football—and ruptured the ear drum which still troubles him and keeps him out of service.

I met him soon after he came to Hollywood for the tennis tournament. A handsome, soft spoken, amiable fellow who looked a little younger than he really was, Jim was disarmingly pleased at the fuss people made over him, happily flattered at the invitations he received to extravagant parties, rather surprised on the whole at the attention he received from glamorous and discriminating young women. Life must have seemed easy and rose-hued to young Brown then.

Yet only a little over a year later he was helping Verna shop for baby things and trying to hide the shakiness inside him when he thought of what might happen if he didn't make good on the "job of actin'," which still seemed strange and was sometimes so very puzzling to him. The baby things were somehow concrete evidence of his responsibility and his necessity.

"We went clear to Santa Monica to buy a baby buggy because we'd heard of a bargain down there," he recalls.

"Later we went to Glendale be-

"VITAMIN LACK CAN CAUSE HAIR TO TURN GRAY," SAYS MODERN SCIENCE

Can This 2-Way VITAMIN Discovery Restore Natural Color to Your GRAY or GRAYING HAIR?

NEW TEST SO EASY IT'S AMAZING!

If your hair is gray, graying, streaked or off-color due to vitamin deficiency, this test of the original PANATES double-action VITAMIN treatment offers you amazing new hope! You have read about the scientific vitamin tests that, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have shown startling signs of results. It has been proven beyond doubt that a lack of certain vitamins in the daily diet may be a contributing cause for hair to lose its natural color and turn gray. Simply by improving your diet and by taking the harmless, concentrated food vitamins in PANATES each day, you may check the gray spread . . . you may actually see gray, old-looking, streaked, fading hair change back at the roots, temples and parting to normal, original color, natural color! But first let me tell you what the original PANATES double-action vitamin method is, how PANATES differs so drastically from other anti-gray hair vitamins and why so many of the thousands of women and men who once accepted PANATES on this same trial offer now continue with it because of the amazing change in hair color they testify as taking place before their very eyes!

A Few of The Scores of Letters From Panates Users

Panates, different from other treatments, gives you Vitamin E, Wheat Germ Oil, in addition to Anti-Gray Hair Vitamins. Thousands of women and men the nation over now are taking PANATES. The following are but a few of the many letters we have received. In PANATES there is hope!

TESTIMONIALS

Mrs. G. M., of Illinois, says: "My hair was auburn—a very beautiful shade with a lot of red in it. . . . It started to turn gray about seven years ago. . . . When I started to take PANATES, the most I hoped for was to have the White hair darken a little, but after three weeks of PANATES, imagine my elation when I noticed I was getting some new hair and, believe it or not, it is decidedly red. . . ."

Mrs. V. S., of Michigan, says: "I have used nearly one box of PANATES and can already see some results. . . ."

Mr. J. M. S., of Virginia, says: "I have just used up one thirty-day treatment of PANATES. I was giving them up, but to my surprise I now see a black beard is coming out on my face and it seems like the hair on my head is getting a little darker. . . ."

Panates Is NOT A HAIR DYE

NOTHING TO FEAR . . . NO MESS, NO FUSS

Panates supply not only the "anti-gray" hair vitamins, but give you the "staff of life" wheat germ oil (Vitamin E) as well. Absolutely harmless, Panates actually is a healthful food supplement. Panates gives your system a source for the hair color vitamins that may be lacking in your daily diet and, if so, should literally feed natural color into the hair roots to check gray spread, to help the hair to new lively lustre and to bring new hope for restoration of normal hair color once again. Panates isn't a hair dye. Panates is the natural way to seek natural hair color. You can test Panates whether you now artificially color your hair or not, because Panates "Anti-Gray" Hair Vitamins with Wheat Germ Oil Vitamin E, feed your system from within. If you now dye your hair, you may notice you need less and less artificial hair color. If your hair is just starting to turn gray, you may notice the graying process is checked and soon the gray strands may be less and less pronounced. That's one of the wonderful things about the "anti-gray" hair vitamins in Panates . . . the action is natural. No one need know you are doing a single thing for your hair. And ladies, Panates will not hurt or interfere with permanents.

WHEN RESTORED COLOR SHOWS, IT'S NATURAL COLOR

No matter what your normal hair color might be, before graying due to vitamin lack, no matter what shade of black, brown, auburn or blonde, if you see signs of hair color restoration, you will be amazed to note that the new color is the original, normal color of your natural hair.

cause we could get some other things more cheaply over there. Of course Verna can sew, and that helped. But I had a lump in my chest all the time!"

He finished "Air Force" and went into "The Good Fellows" about then. The baby, Beverly Jean, was born in December, 1942, and the Browns began the frantic business of finding a house in the Valley, since the owners of the Beverly Hills apartment house weren't very cordial about infants, no matter how adorable.

There never was such a baby, you may be sure. She's going to be as beautiful as her mother. "No one could be more beautiful!" says her dad. And she's as talented as Duse. At the moment Jim is convinced that she says, "Daddy!" with all the depth of emotion and intellect of the greatest actress who ever trod the boards. "You've no idea!" he repeats over and over.

When Beverly Jean was a few weeks old, it was Alexis Smith who said, "I haven't seen Jim's baby. But I'll wager I could walk into a hospital ward where there were a hundred of 'em and pick out Beverly Jean. Jim has described every hair on her head, every dimple and every crease in her elbows in detail. I couldn't possibly miss!"

Verna took the baby east to see her parents for a short stay when Beverly was a tidy eight months old, and Jim found again that he couldn't eat—"not even ham and eggs!"

Such didoes are incredible, he thinks. But there it is. And instead of barging around as he would have as a bachelor, and enjoying his freedom, bless pat if Jim didn't spend his dough on a bottle of really swank perfume for Verna and a check to buy a bond for the baby.

His performances in his newest pictures. "Corvette K-225" and "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" are being hailed with excitement, and he is working currently on "Going My Way" with Bing Crosby.

"I'm not so scared any more," he says, "except once in a while when sort of a wave comes over me and I realize that I could still slip. If anything should happen now—or ever—to keep Verna and the baby from being proud of me, I'd die. But I've had a lot of help from good directors and I know now what I have to do. I'm beginning to see how to do it.

"If I hadn't married when I first started, I'd have quit pictures a dozen times. Times like when I had to work for days in water in 'Corvette' and my bum ear was killing me—or when I was bawled out for not understanding something—or when any number of things happened to hurt and discourage me. I guess I wasn't disciplined for this sort of job in the first place, and I know I never would have stuck if I hadn't had to for Verna and Beverly Jean."

"Well, you're all set now," I remarked.

Jim looking grim. "Nobody's ever 'all set' in this business," he reproved. "I've just learned how to stick for those two girls I love."

The End

THAT GUY BOB HOPE

"Churchill crosses the Atlantic so often," comments Bob Hope, "I wonder if he isn't delivering Eleanor Roosevelt's laundry."

place in the first grade room at school—and on the cheek. How I was so shocked that I cried. (How I have changed! Now I'm shocked if I'm not kissed!)

My first "sophisticated" dress, a little slipper satin number, and my horror when I spilled ice-cream on it; my first picture, "Search for Beauty" at Paramount, and how I thought I'd never live through it; my first screen kiss, administered by Fred MacMurray, who then dropped me like a hot rock; Sir Guy Standing, who sort of took me under his wing; New York; Mexico; the Mariachos at Xochimilco, the town where the floating gardens are; the Mexican people.

I CAN'T BEAR:

People who get "hurt"; playing games in which you have to act things out; the sound of a dripping faucet; dog-eared books; sitting under a dryer for more than five minutes; people who paw you while they're talking to you.

Dirty ash trays; people who talk with their mouths full; people who sulk; untidiness; to talk on the telephone; men who are rude to waiters and flirtatious with waitresses; men who are tight-fisted.

I'M IMPRESSED WITH:

The untiring effort and energy the film folk give the Hollywood Canteen.

The music, singing, dancing, staging of "Oklahoma."

The balance and simplicity Jimmy Cagney has maintained through the years of his fame.

I MARVEL AT:

The boys in the Armed Forces who have been decorated for bravery, yet who have the jitters when they ask screen stars for their autographs.

Bob Hope's endurance, his tenacity and ability to make the boys laugh.

The bounce and buoyancy of people after the most grievous afflictions.

Some of the wonderful notices I've got for the corny performances I've given.

I'M MAD ABOUT:

Rhumba music; Spanish food; dancing, especially and particularly with Cesar Romero.

Steve Hannagan's gags. Such as the time when he arranged for me to be met at the station in Chicago, and what met me was a huge red limousine belonging to the Chicago Fire Department in which, perforce, I was driven to my hotel, sirens blowing.

Peter Godfrey's directing of my current picture, "One More Tomorrow"; the perfume "Sans La Nuit"; Six p.m. of every week-day because that is quitting time at the studio.

A very old, very feeble and faded pair of "bunny" bedroom slippers; the aroma of a good cigar; sweaters, but not for the reason you think.

I WISH I COULD:

Fly a plane; walk without being pigeon-toed; dance well enough to dance with Fred Astaire; go without having to have my curly hair straightened; smell fish without feeling sick; sing like Dinah Shore.

Make an impromptu speech without aging ten years in five minutes; live in Mexico and make just two pictures a year in Hollywood; stay mad at Ames, my French poodle, just long enough to discipline the little fiend; do my own hair in a pompadour the way my hairdresser, Helen Turpin, does it for me; take myself a little more seriously; laugh without knocking the plaster off the ceiling.

Fall in love again.

I LIKE TO READ:

The funny papers; plays, especially comedies; mysteries; the novel, "International House," which is my favorite; some poetry—beautiful, singing stuff, not the "deep" kind. In short, light literature.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Never writing "thank you" notes; speaking my mind when it isn't diplomatic to do so; soaking my bread in salad dressing; answering the phone and disguising my voice; smoking too many cigarettes; telling jokes and

Liking to sleep the clock around; eating fried chicken three times a day; hating to be hostess at dinner parties (In fact, I never give them, just a few friends in for informal suppers does it); not being able to resist buying slacks and moccasins (unrationed) when I see them in shop windows; being monotonously punctual; loving comfort, freedom and independence.

I'M ANNOYED WITH:

Anyone who says "I did this for you—remember?"; Anyone who makes a stale joke about, alas, my so-called, so sick-makingly called "Oomph"; Certain girls who have a "great lady" complex, especially when they crook their little fingers as they drink tea; girls who lead men on and then get oh, so shocked when the boys get interested; gum poppers in back of me when I'm seeing a romantic movie; people who say I'm in love.

I'M THRILLED WITH:

The courage of my friend, and former hairdresser, Linda Cross, who was disabled by a horrible accident and is now, thanks to her grit and gallantry, walking again.

The memory of Alfred Drake singing "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning" in "Oklahoma"; Katherine Dunham's native dances; the sight and smell of golden brown, crackling fried chicken; the red sky at sunset on the desert; that magnificent show "Winged Victory" and all the guys therein; those puny radishes that came up in my victory garden.

Owning my first home in the Valley; Mexico, of course; the remembered kindness of Jimmy Cagney when I got my first good break in his "Angels With Dirty Faces"; any and all rhumba music; the chance given me by Sam Wood to play Randy in "Kings Row" and the added thrill of being called a "good actress" by the critics who reviewed it.

COVER COSTUME

"China Poblana"—that's the name of the costume Ann Sheridan wears as Movieland's cover girl. And the story behind it is that years ago a pretty Chinese girl came to Pueblo, a little town near Mexico City. She loved the beauty and romance of the country and fashioned a dress which combined the artistry of the two countries. Mexican in design and Chinese in feeling, the dress was soon to become a famous costume in Mexico. And last winter when Ann vacationed there, she was feted at a gala party hosted by the Mexican Film Industry, and their gift to her was . . . the "China" costume.

I JUDGE PEOPLE BY:

What they do, not what they say they do, or will do; the look in their eyes; the tone of a voice, for while a voice can be trained to sound pleasing, cultured, softer than natural, the sincerity behind it cannot be faked and, if it is, is never convincing for long.

Their outside interests because, if a person is interested in the average, sane and simple things in life, he's apt to be a pretty regular individual.

The way they are to me, regardless of their reputations or past experiences with other persons, true or not.

I NEVER JUDGE PEOPLE BY:

Their clothes; their social standing (whatever that is); their financial rating; first impressions, because I know from personal experience that people are ofttimes shy or suffering from inferiority complexes which causes them to put on acts or anything they think may get them by.

I BELIEVE:

In living for Today as much as possible; that everything does happen for the best, though at a time of disappointment or failure, this may be hard to believe; in making mistakes, because a person learns more from mistakes than from all the successful ventures in the world.

The critics who have panned me in my past pictures. For they were one hundred per cent right.

That it is impossible to have many really close friends in Hollywood.

That Hollywood stars who believe their own publicity ought to be spanked—you know where!

That I'm talking too much about myself, but Movieland asked for it!

I HOPE:

That I'll never lose my sense of humor; that I'll never have to wear tight corsets again as I did, for ten whale-boned weeks, in "Shine On, Harvest Moon"; to have a happy marriage and children some day; that the war will be over very soon; that I can go overseas to entertain the boys who are doing the magnificent job; that I never become bitter because of a disappointment or a disillusioning experience; that I can always laugh.

their nails, what do we need you for?"

Even the fanciest visitors aren't exempt from the biting tongues of the two comedians. A visibly impressed-with-her-own-importance lady, done up in minks, high-heeled her way onto the set one day, started talking in a falsetto that could be heard all over the set. She was telling her friends, probably to impress the unimpressionable Crosby-Hope combination, about her forefathers having come over on the Mayflower. Crosby flipped an aside to Bob, "That's the trouble with this business. Too many foreigners." The lady left.

Many of the biggest laughs on a "Road" set result from impromptu story and gag conferences which spot their working day.

At one of these, the comedians and Hal Walker were sitting with Frank and Panama, writers of the film. All manner of suggestions were made for speeding up the tempo of a certain scene.

Finally Hope snapped his fingers and came up with an idea. When he finished, Crosby asked, "Do you think that's good?" With a touch of condescension, Bob admitted it might do.

"That," squelched Bing, "is the kind of suggestion people send in by mail."

Hope has a secretary whose flair for restraint and understatement are a constant source of amusement to everyone who knows the star. The other day she visited the set and was asked to look at the rushes. When the film had unreeled, Hal Walker asked her how she liked the Utopian trio and their work. Her answer was a brief, "Adequate."

Right away Bob cracked, "I knew we were doing a terrific job."

With their divergent types of humor, they are always at their best when banging away at each other. Hope may start out working alone, but Bing usually turns up. On one of these occasions Bob asked Bing's opinion of a new sport coat which the tailor was trying on him between scenes.

"Robin," said Bing, gazing admiringly at the shoulders, "those pads should be used as hangars for carrier pigeons."

Another day the scene had Bob and Bing entertaining at a San Francisco honky-tonk, preparatory to taking off to Alaska. Hope had just concluded his stint and in accordance with instructions from Director Walker the extras were merely going through the motions of applause because the sound track had already been recorded. As a result there was complete silence. This impressed Crosby.

"That," he chuckled, "reminds me of the reception you received last night."

Hope's nose and Crosby's ears are subjects for endless wisecracks. When Bing told Bob that he had received a request for a picture from some Waves training in North Carolina, Hope cracked, "I know. They don't have a donkey, so they'll tack your picture on the wall and try to pin a tail on your ears."

Hope calls Crosby's ears king-size, and Bing evens that with a reminder that Frances Langford tells that when they visited ski-troop training camp, the lads had practiced on Bob's nose.

Getting back to the friendship thing, which is very real, it was Hope's house which served as refuge for the Crosby clan when the crooner's home was destroyed by fire. Later Bing had his new home completely fireproofed. Hope couldn't resist the temptation. "What you should do," he contended, "is have that stork fireproofed. I have it on good authority your home was set on fire by a stork carrying a match."

One morning after visiting the Hope home, Crosby told Bob that the Hope children had made a pretty serious complaint the night before, concerning their father. Bob was immediately upset. "What did they say?" "They said," replied Bing, "that every time you come home—which is seldom—you're making a personal appearance."

They like to put on an act for strangers and usually succeed in convincing the uninitiate that they are among the town's top feudists. One of their favorite routines for the unsuspecting takes place just after a scene in which both have an equal amount of work to do. When the director calls for a cut, Bob will turn to Bing and snarl, "I understand you don't like me."

"That's right," comes back Bing.

"Do you want to make anything of it?" Bob will query belligerently.

"Yeah!" Crosby retorts, "I want to go on disliking you. Do you mind?"

While they don't spare anyone in the studio or the rest of the world, Bing and Bob are probably among the best liked troupers on a sound stage. They'll poke fun at anyone, but they are also first in line when a person gets in trouble. Told that someone had made this remark about them, Bob agreed, told the story about the extra with a reputation for drinking who had to spend an entire day on the "Utopia" set swilling nothing stronger than milk.

To prove their big heartedness Bob said, "Bing and I insist on his getting a stunt check."

As riotous and wacky as are the "Road" pictures when shown to the public, they are funnier off screen while they are being shot. As proof you have Director Walker's classic remark after a day's work with the Damon and Pythias of comedy.

"We ought to shelve the picture," he said sadly, "and just screen Crosby and Hope."

THE END

WE APOLOGIZE, LORETTA AND SALLY!

In the February Movieland, in our story on Loretta Young, there crept in one of those factual errors that sometimes escape the most vigilant editorial eye.

Unfortunately, our story stated that Sally Blane, one of the four beautiful Young sisters, had married Harry Joe Brown and recently divorced him to marry Norman Foster. It was Sally Eilers who was married to Harry Joe Brown and recently divorced him.

Betty Jane Young, who adopted the screen name of Sally Blane, has been married only once. Her husband is Norman Foster, and their marriage is one of ideal happiness.

PEG RYAN

clothes, some glamour ought to come out—even with my face!"

The kid was visibly thrilled. "I also wear a black satin dress in 'Patrick the Great.' I drape and slink in it. My fiance, Sergeant Ray Hirsch, ought to be completely captured when he sees me in it. The boys at his camp have all been teasing him, saying, 'What's wrong with Ryan? Why does she always lose her man in pictures?' Now I'll show 'em."

Actually, she's shown them already. Sgt. Hirsch has been amazed many times by the men who stroll over to him and say casually, "Have I shown you a picture of my girl?" Then they drag forth one of those autographed pictures you get by sending twenty-five cents to a studio, and say proudly, "See. That's her." It's amazing the number of men who claim Peggy is their girl, though she's never met them.

Once Peggy was Donald O'Connor's girl, but it was never serious. Peggy first met Donald casually in Hollywood. They met again when she was in the cast of "Meet the People." Donald, who wanted to go places and who had knocked himself out in vaudeville for years, hung around backstage at every theater, including the one where Peggy was playing. Then he invited her out. So she went—straight to some drive-in. At the time, Donald pretended to be nineteen. He had quite a man-of-the-world air about him. He would hand Peggy a dime and say, "Here, blow yourself to anything—just anything at all."

He was really sixteen, and he wanted to get into pictures. So did Peggy. Together they made the rounds. They couldn't get into anything. Everyone said, "We don't need kids." Even the juke boxes wouldn't have them.

"Some day," Donald would say, "we'll show them."

"Yes," said Peggy, "I know you'll make good."

Peggy was born in Long Beach, California. "Mother and Dad were in vaudeville," she tells you. "They were known as the Dancing Ryans. Mother did tap steps even when she was doing the housework, and Dad had black curly hair on which he used to use some terrific goo. Maybe he wanted to look like Valentino.

"When Mother knew a little Ryan was coming along, she quit vaudeville. There already was one Ryan Junior—my brother Mickey, who is six years older than I, and who is now a sergeant in the Air Force. With me arriving, Mother felt it was time to retire. She wanted to devote all her time to taking care of us kids.

"When I was nearly three, I was bow-legged. Mother thought a few dancing lessons would fix that, so she started giving them to me. I took lessons four months and wonderfully, I was cured. I was so completely cured I made my first professional appearance at an Elks benefit at San Diego, doing a butterfly dance.

"The affair was a smoker. When I came out, the men in their big white shirt fronts, all smoking, looked like penguins to me, and I ran off the stage, scared blue. Mother made me go back. She told me never to run away from anything. She was right. If she hadn't made me go back, maybe I would always be running away.

"Mother thought it would be a good idea for me to have some professional lessons. She'd had a hard life, and she figured mine would be easier if I became a trained dancer. She didn't have enough money to pay for lessons, so she taught singing in exchange for my dancing lessons.

"Every once in a while, I'd earn three dollars here and there for dancing."

Often Peggy won prizes at amateur shows. But one day another girl in the class said to her, "You'll never amount to anything—with a face like yours."

Peggy returned home, tears streaming down her cheeks. "I don't want even to go back to that school," she told her mother.

"But you must," her mother said. "Perhaps that girl was jealous because you dance so well. Learn to use everything you've got. It's what you have inside that counts."

Peggy remembered that when she was nine, and she and her mother came to Hollywood. She enrolled in the Hollywood Professional School. There Peg met Dave Gould, M-G-M dance director, who liked the way she danced and signed her up because of her clever imitation of Eleanor Powell. When Eleanor said, "I want Peggy to play me as a child in my next picture," the kid thought she was all set.

But nothing happened. After three months M-G-M dropped her without ever letting her work. So Dave Gould arranged for Peggy to appear at the Actors' Fund Benefit.

All the big producers in town were at the show and the kid really clicked. Eleanor Powell sent a bunch of flowers with a note saying, "You are my protege." Universal decided it could use Peggy in "Top of the Town."

The studio thought this picture would be a sensation. Peggy did two dances in it, and she was good. But the picture was bad, so the studio let Peggy languish. Every once in a while Universal would loan her out or put her in some icky part where she sobbed, "My mother has just died," or some such.

The number of weepers in pictures is quite large, and few of them ever get anywhere. After a while, Mrs. Ryan said, "Well, it looks as if you're not going to click in these parts. We'll have to try something else." Hearing of "Meet the People"—the stage show, which would play in San Francisco, Chicago, New York and other cities—Mrs. Ryan persuaded the casting director to give Peggy a chance to dance in the show.

At rehearsals, Danny Dare, the dance director, discerned Peggy's gift and said, "I'm going to give you some comedy numbers."

Peggy had hit her stride. She was so successful that by the time the show hit Boston, she was doing thirteen out of twenty-six numbers.

When Peggy returned to Hollywood, after that year of successful trouping, she got into another show, "They Can't Get You Down." The first night she took eight bows; and Universal woke up to what it had been missing and quickly cast her, as a comedienne, in "What's Cookin.'"

"They Can't Get You Down" also brought another turning point in Peggy's life. For in the cast was tall, good-looking Ray Hirsch, with curly hair and eyes as blue as Peggy's.

One night the producers of "They Can't Get You Down" decided to throw a big party at Ciro's for the members of the cast. Peggy hoped Ray (on whom she'd had her eye ever since the show opened) would reach her first with a request for her to be his partner at Ciro's. But another boy in the show got to her first, and Peggy was too polite to turn him down.

All through the evening at Ciro's, however, she kept wishing that her escort was Ray; Ray, who'd sat in the back seat of the car with another girl, his infectious laughter ringing through the car. Well, if Ray didn't feel "that way" about her, what could a girl do?

The other fellow took her home. He was, in fact, at the door with her when Ray came up to her and whispered, "May I call you?" The other boy glowered, but Peggy was beyond caring. She whispered her phone number and an ardent "Yes."

When he called the next day, she confessed that she had been hoping he would take her to Ciro's the night before, and he said, wonderfully, "Let's go there tonight and pretend it is yesterday."

So they went and pretended. They didn't have to pretend to fall in love. They fell.

"He looked so cute in his tux," Peggy sighs. "Now he's a Sergeant in the Marines, and he looks cute in his uniform. I have a suit with stripes on the sleeves just like his. Whenever he gets another stripe, I add one to my suit.

"My house looks like a Marine fort—it's so full of Marine souvenirs. When we go out together, I'm loaded down with Marine pins and bracelets Ray has given me. If I didn't wear 'em all, he'd be hurt."

They became engaged two years ago, in the month of Valentines. His birthday is February 6th and Peggy took some fried chicken and a recording machine to the camp where he is stationed. He gave her his mother's engagement ring.

"The way he proposed was so nice," Peggy sighs. "He asked my mom and dad first. Ray is twenty-two. At first, he was ashamed of being engaged to a girl of seventeen and told everyone I was eighteen; but now I'm nineteen, so we tell the truth. He says nineteen is old enough."

Peggy had been engaged on three previous occasions. "When I admit it, I sound so fickle, but I'm not any longer. This is really serious. My first engagement was a school romance when I was fourteen, and after we got disengaged, I was afraid nobody would ever ask me out again. You know how it is at fifteen. My second engagement was at sixteen; the third at sixteen and three-quarters.

"But this time it's real. Ray knows how to handle me. Yep, those Marines know.

"Ray is a champion jitterbug. He was more jitterbuggy than I, but he changed his dancing slightly to suit mine, and I changed mine to suit his, and now we get along in a nice groove.

"However, we won't marry while the war's on. I should hate to have Ray overseas when I was having my first baby. I think it's awful for a father not to see his baby when it's first born. I'd hate to have Ray miss a minute of the lives of our babies."

She laughed. "But that's a long way off. I plan to get married at twenty-two and have my first baby at twenty-five."

She's a curious mixture of childish naivete and real maturity. Like Claudia, there seem to be two sides of Peggy's personality, the play suit side and the slinky black satin side.

"If you can't laugh, then how are you going to have anything but an icky time?" asks Peggy. "I ride, bowl, fish—then once in a while I like to dress up and be very ladylike. I can't stand girls primping all the time. I stick a comb in Ray's pocket, but hardly ever use it. I think you should scrub your face, put on some lipstick, and then forget your appearance. When I try to be glamorous, Donald O'Connor says, 'You just be Peggy. That's the way I like you.'"

In the Universal beauty parlor, Peggy tried on the Dietrich turban for Maria Montez, explaining she was going to wear it in "Patrick the Great." "How do you think it looks?" she asked. "Well, darling," Montez said, "it's fine if you're supposed to be funny, but if you're supposed to look glamorous, it is still funny."

Peggy smiled. "That's all right. I'll stick to laughs."

Peggy is superstitious; wears hair ribbons for luck, is partial to blue. She loves redecorating rooms. She redecorated the breakfast nook in the Ryan home for a total outlay of eighty-five cents.

What sends her? Hot fudge sundaes, Andre Kostelanetz's "Tea for Two," steaks when they're available, and the music of Tommy Dorsey. And, of course, a curly headed Marine whom she calls "Hershey," because he mails her a chocolate bar every day. "He's keeping up my morale," she says smiling. She keeps up his by sending him wonderful letters seven times a week.

"What do you say in them?" I asked.

She gave me a pert glance from under those long lashes. "Oh, you!" she laughed.

"I mean outside of love."

"But there's nothing else," she said. "What else could there be?"

WORDS OF MUSIC

Helen Forrest has gone out on her own, everyone has wondered which recording company would sign her. So far there has been no announcement, but inasmuch as her manager, Billy Burton, also handles Jimmy Dorsey, Dick Haymes, Helen O'Connell and Kitty Kallen, and they are all Decca artists, I wouldn't be surprised to see Helen under the same banner.

Columbia Records' best platter salesman, Frank Sinatra, is with us again. This time he offers two songs from his first picture, "Higher and Higher"—"I Couldn't Sleep A Wink Last Night" and "A Lovely Way To Spend An Evening." The Columbia company is still unable to record with an orchestra because they haven't as yet settled with the American Federation of Musicians, so Frank is once more backed up by a choral group—but let's hope that before his next release the whole thing will be straightened out and he can have some of that fine Axel Stordahl music behind him. . . .

On an Okeh disc is that jivin' man, Cab Calloway with his band, doing "I'll Be Around," and "Virginia, Georgia, and Caroline." This was made a long while ago, but the release date seems timed well with the current success of the song, "I'll Be Around."

EARMARKS OF HITS:

On one of her recent air shows, Judy Canova introduced a ballad entitled "Goodnight Soldier," and the next day the publishers received orders for thirty seven hundred copies, which isn't a bad order after a first hearing of a tune. . . .

"The Honey Song," which had a mild success several years ago as a hillbilly song, has received a shot in the arm and is being revived as a rhythm number. . . . "Can't You Do A Friend A Favor?", one of the hits from the current Broadway success, "Connecticut Yankee," is the last song written by Rogers and Hart before Hart's untimely death.

Dinah Shore introduced "Tess' Torch Song" and "Now I Know," on her program recently. They are both from her new Goldwyn picture, "Up In Arms," and were written by Harold Arlen and Ted Koehler. You'll be hearing them much, much.

Jack Lawrence, who wrote "All Or Nothing At All," has composed a torch ballad called "My Heart Isn't In It," with a very sentimental lyric. But if you're disappointed in love, don't listen too closely.

ON THE BEAM:

Trudy Erwin, Bing Crosby's duet partner on the Kraft program, has

Letter to a P.O.W.

WILL YOU WRITE a letter to a Prisoner of War . . . tonight?

Perhaps he was left behind when Bataan fell. Perhaps he had to bail out over Germany. Anyway, he's an American, and he hasn't had a letter in a long, long time.

And when you sit down to write, tell him why you didn't buy your share of War Bonds last pay day—if you didn't.

"Dear Joe," you might say, "the old topcoat was getting kind of threadbare, so I . . ."

No, cross it out. Joe might not understand about the topcoat, especially if he's shivering in a damp Japanese cell.

Let's try again. "Dear Joe, I've been working pretty hard and haven't had a vacation in over a year, so . . ."

Better cross that out, too. They don't ever get vacations where Joe's staying.

Well, what are you waiting for? Go ahead, write the letter to Joe. Try to write it, anyhow.

But mister, or madam, or miss, if somehow you find you can't finish that letter, will you, at least, do this for Joe? Will you up the amount of money you're putting into your Payroll Savings Plan—so that you'll be buying your share of War Bonds from here on in? And will you—for Joe's sake—start doing it right away?

retired from the show temporarily to await the call of the stork in April. In private life she is the wife of Murdo McKenzie, civilian instructor with the Air Corps and formerly a member of N.B.C.'s engineering staff in Hollywood. . . . Tommy Dorsey was all set for a nightly fifteen minute shot over C.B.S. for the Ford Motor Company, but at the last minute something happened and the deal is off. . . .

Mary Lee, Republic star, and chirper on Columbia's Jack Carson show, was married recently to First Sgt. Harry Banan of the Army. Mary got her musical start in life at the age of twelve with the old Ted Weems band. . . .

Jack Baker, tenor star of the Blue Network's "Breakfast Club," is another singer who took the big step. He revealed that he has been secretly married to non-professional Polly Willoughby since November 22. And here's a new twist: He sang at his own wedding. Right after the ceremony he serenaded his bride with "I Love You Truly."

Les Paul, the electric-guitarist who was heavily featured by Fred Waring for four years, has organized a fine trio which has been heard on the "What's New?" show over N.B.C. and other network programs. . . . Sammy Kaye's "Sunday Serenade" over the Blue is originating from Hollywood, while Sammy and the band are making "Song Of The Open Road," for Charles Rogers. . . . In Columbia's film, "The Heat's On," Jack Owens, formerly with Ray Noble, sings "Thinkin' Of The Wabash." Which is very unusual for Jack, because it's the first time he has ever been photographed singing in a picture. Up to now he has been the camera voice for many movie heroes, including Jimmy Stewart, Jimmy Ellison, and John Hubbard. . . . Spike Jones, who is heard on the Bob Burns show over N.B.C., has added a new "instrument" to his collection of pots and pans—a musical anvil, which was presented to him by the workers of the California Shipyards after Spike and the band made a personal appearance there in a War Bond show.

If you listen to the Bob Hope show, you've probably had a chuckle over the "Poor Miriam" singing commercials. The role of "Miriam" is taken by Dolly Mitchell, Stan Kenton's pretty vocalist. All the boys in the band and everybody on the program ribbed her for months, calling her "Poor Miriam." It finally got so that no one ever called her by her right name, so she decided to change it professionally to Miriam Mitchell. "Now," she says, "if they'll just forget the 'poor.' " ten minutes to beat my way backstage. Frank told me he was glad to be back in California and that he was looking forward to making his new picture for R.K.O., which is tentatively titled "Mr. Cinderella."

Harry James had a sensational opening at the Hollywood Palladium, although he didn't break the attendance record held by Charlie Spivak. Every intermission Harry was besieged by autograph friends and photographers, but he seemed to enjoy every minute of it. I am an old Helen Ward fan, so I was very happy that she finally joined the James band. Hearing her sing "It's Been So Long" brought back memories of the old Palomar Ballroom, where I first saw her with Benny Goodman. . . . Maurice Rocco, the Negro pianist, has a solo spot in Betty Hutton's new Paramount picture, "Incendiary Blonde." Which reminds me, Betty has been rehearsing an act with Johnny Johnston, with an eye to going overseas as soon as their schedules permit. . . .

Tommy Dorsey has sold all his music publishing interests, and is once again concentrating only on his band. Jimmy Cook is back with him as vocalist, after having been replaced for a short while by Teddy Walters. And sitting in the drummer's chair is Gene Krupa. . . . Gail Robbins, Twentieth Century-Fox hopeful, who was discovered singing with the old Ben Bernie band, got a two-week vacation from the studio to marry her childhood sweetheart, Lt. Bob Olson of the Army, and upon reporting back to work was told that she would have the lead in a picture called "I Married A Soldier." Call it coincidence!

Navy News: Jack Jenney, Artie Shaw's trombonist in civilian life, has donned the blue suit and joined Artie's Navy band. Dave Tough, who has been with Artie since he organized his service outfit, was given a medical discharge and is back in Hollywood. He'll probably work radio for a while. . . . Freddie Slack was a sailor for just one month, and then was given a medical discharge. So he now has the headache of reorganizing his band again. . . . The Andrews Sisters, who broke all kinds of theatre records during their Texas tour, are off on another one—this time to the Northwest. . . . Here's my favorite story of the month: Paul Carley, Jimmy Dorsey vocalist who replaced Bob Eberly when Bob went into the army, considers himself to be just about the luckiest guy in the world. Paul was an extra working on the set of Dorsey's picture, "Four Jills and a Jeep." One day during the lunch hour, he and some other extras were fooling around, singing and playing the piano. Dorsey sauntered onto the set and heard Paul sing a tune, and decided right then and there that he was the boy to sing with the band. Jimmy rehearsed him every day during the noon hour, and between camera set-ups, because they were leaving in a week for their eastern engagements. Paul was a hit on his first appearance before the public and when the band played the New York Roxy Theatre, he took seven encores after his first song. A movie extra one week and next week, soloist with one of America's top musical outfits! Nice goin', yes?

WARREN'S WAX WORKS

From Columbia Masterworks: "Cinderella," a fantasy in three parts, played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra with Eric Coates conducting.

Decca's sensational album of the score from "The Song of Bernadette" with Alfred Newman conducting the orchestra and a female chorus of thirty voices. Eight sides.

OLDIES BUT GOODIES:

Victor's re-issue of Artie Shaw's "Dancing In The Dark" backed up by David Rose's orchestra playing Rose's beautiful composition, "Poinciana."

Lena Horne's Victor Album, "Moanin' Low," including such fine tunes as "Stormy Weather," "I've Got a Right to Sing the Blues" and "Ill Wind." Some of these sides can be purchased individually, but you'd better check with your local music store.

"Shoo, Shoo, Baby," sung by Ella Mae Morse and played by Dick Walter's band. Good background music done in the Ellington manner. Capitol.

"Harlem Folk Dance" by Stan Kenton's orchestra. This is one of Stan's original instrumentals, and features two fine trumpet solos by Karl George and John Carroll, plus good tenor work by Red Dorris.

LARAINE DAY

decided to reveal my true feelings on the situation, I felt that my report should also be made public. My report, in effect, stated that the tendency of army officers to monopolize film personalities and other entertainers who visit the camps is unfair to the enlisted men. I said that I had gone out to visit the privates and the non-coms—and instead, I had spent at least half my time making small talk with officers and their wives. I enumerated specific incidents that had occurred, and concluded by saying that I hoped the report would help clear up this unpleasant and most unfair situation.

One of the criticisms leveled at me is that I should have made a discreet, unpublicized report, and let the Hollywood Victory Committee, or the Army, straighten things out. Let's get that situation correct, right now!

I have made five types of tours: for bond-selling, the Red Cross, the War Chest, the Infantile Paralysis Fund, and camp shows. That's quite a program to tackle. And when you do it, you wish to feel you have been of maximum service. Even on the "civilian" tours, I protested, quietly, about the fact that I seemed to meet only "big shots" and had virtually no contact with people who are "just folks." Before I went out on this last camp tour, I had already visited several west coast camps, and knew what to expect.

I did go to the Hollywood Victory Committee, quietly, and tell them I wouldn't go on the tour unless I could receive assurance that Joe Private would get my attention. This, I understand, was discussed with the War Department. I received assurances, and I further understood that the War Department, acting in perfectly good faith, as you would expect them to, wrote ahead to the camps I was to visit, explaining in so many words that I was to spend no time with officers.

The instructions were observed in only three camps during my fast-moving three weeks!

I was sorry that a number of army officers felt my statement was a personal affront to them. I was terribly upset about this reaction, for in my report I stated, "Every officer I met was a perfect gentleman and treated me with the utmost respect and consideration. But that was the trouble. They were all so attentive that I was given little opportunity to do the job I was sent out to do—see the boys, chat with them, and bring a little cheer and fun into their lives."

There is involved a matter of common justice—to parents as well as to men in the armed services—in this question of giving the G. I. soldier the real benefit of visits to camps. Nickels, dimes and quarters are contributed in movie theaters to the USO by the general run of patrons, and are used to pay the entertainers' and visitors' traveling expenses to camps. It is obvious that the bulk of this money is donated by relatives of enlisted men, and that ought to have some effect on who is entertained—or my arithmetic is poor.

Let's examine some incidents that occurred. In one camp the C. O. said, "Miss Day, I know how you feel about meeting privates instead of officers. However, we have here five hundred junior officers. It's no military secret that many of them will soon head overseas. Won't you at least have one meal with them?" That sounded reasonable. Heaven knows, officers are people, too—and any man heading overseas has a natural place in any woman's heart.

So, escorted into the mess hall by more rank than I knew existed, I was walked right past the five hundred junior officers, into another dining room where I had dinner. I counted up. At my table sat three generals and twelve full colonels.

The thousands of men at that camp all were under the impression that I had had dinner with those five hundred junior officers. Those five hundred boys, however, must have taken the attitude that I felt myself too good to have dinner with them—that I preferred the company of the generals and the colonels. I felt in almost every instance that the boys did not resent their officers. They always felt that that high-toned, snooty, Hollywood actress would rather spend her time with the "Gold Braid" than with them. How wrong they were!

Similar things happened when I declared pointedly that I'd rather eat in the G. I. mess than at the officers' club. The high-rankers would agree. Then a batch—anywhere from two to ten—would go into the G. I. mess with me. They would be my dinner companions, and naturally no privates would or could get close enough to speak with me.

The same applies to being shown around camp. What private is going to barge up and speak to a girl who is being escorted by a colonel?

The above specific examples have importance, because the newspapers quoted "one Army spokesman" as saying the Army had checked back over the entire course of my tour and, "We are able to find nothing to substantiate her statement."

That must have been some check! Within two weeks after the Army rebuked me I received more than four thousand letters from service men. Exactly four letters disagreed with what I had reported. Two of those were anonymous and two were from officers—and one of the two officers afterward wrote me a handsome and generous letter of apology.

The letters have passed the ten thousand mark now, still holding about the same ratio—a thousand to one supporting what I reported. Many of the letters are signed by from ten to thirty men, who took the trouble to hold a meeting and draw up a formal statement of confidence and appreciation. Let me add, too, that a number of officers, whose careers wouldn't be helped by letters on the subject, phoned me "off the record" and informed me that they recognized the situation and that it should have been exposed long ago.

Players who have gone on camp tours for two years have discussed this situation many times. But who wants to fight the Army or Navy? For my part, however, the enlisted men are in the armed services, too, and I had rather have my ten thousand letters than the appreciation I won't get from any anonymous "spokesmen."

I have been criticized to the effect that my statement was ill-timed because it brought disunity to the armed forces. I wish to take issue on that criticism. I feel that the situation as it existed, not only in my case but in the cases of practically every other person to go out of Hollywood on camp tours in the past two years, was responsible for more seething resentment on the part of the enlisted men. The response that came from these boys on reading my statement showed how much they appreciated someone's going to bat in their behalf. A soldier is likely to have much more respect for, and much more affection for, a superior officer who graciously bows out of the picture when a film personality visits his camp, and turns her over to him and his pals, rather than if the officer monopolizes her time during her entire stay. The enlisted man has to say that his officer is a swell guy!

I want you to read some paragraphs from enlisted men's letters. But I'll have to warn you—some of the praise goes far overboard. It is embarrassing to me to allow even the milder examples to be printed, but the extent to which thousands of boys have gone in expressing gratefulness for what was merely a plain duty indicates the importance to them of the problem itself, and the bitterness that neglect of it by the authorities may nourish. Here are a few quotes:

"There are many cases similar to those you have brought to light. It happened here recently. A famous name band visited us. The enlisted men at that show were greatly outnumbered by officers, their wives and civilian friends. Many of us—we are patients—stood in line for hours, only to have the door shut in our faces. We hope that can be remedied."

"Not one private out of fifty gets to see the USO shows here. But the officers get in!"

"We feel that we express the sentiments of enlisted men in all branches of the service when we say you are tops. You risked scandal and bad publicity, and we appreciate it very much."

* * *

"Hats off to you for your blunt and honest opinion of how the USO camp tours should be conducted. Up to now I, and also my shipmates, had never suspected the truth—that you and your fellow artists wanted to be more friendly to the enlisted men."

"We would gladly fall in line for the opportunity to speak in your behalf."

I could quote enough such excerpts to fill MOVIELAND all year. Letters, too, are now coming in from far places. Many letters are from men who have been invalided home, after eleven months in the Aleutians—or scores of the envelopes bear APO return addresses indicating writers abroad. But I think the men who have seen overseas service, and are in home camps convalescing from wounds, feel the most deeply. They are convinced they are entitled to maximum good treatment. I agree with my correspondents—all ten thousand of them—and with the other thousands who undoubtedly react the same way.

Bob Hope, Jack Benny, Judy Garland, Betty Hutton, and other great Hollywood personalities can give a full hour of magnificent performances at Army camps. The enlisted man

KIDNEYS MUST REMOVE EXCESS ACIDS

Help 15 Miles of Kidney Tubes Flush Out Poisonous Waste

If you have an excess of acids in your blood, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may be over-worked. These tiny filters and tubes are working day and night to help Nature rid your system of excess acids and poisonous waste.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Kidneys may need help the same as bowels, so ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

who do get in to see these shows go away with some sense of acquaintance with the people on the stage.

There are people like myself, however, who are sent out particularly to visit and simply express the comradeship that all women on and off the screen feel for our armed forces. We do not have the particular talent to get up on a stage and entertain thousands of boys at one time. We must go through the camps chatting with a few boys at a time, signing autographs, talking to them about their girls back home, answering their questions about Hollywood. For a few moments, at least, we hope to give the boys the impression that other people know what a wonderful job they are doing, and how much their work is appreciated.

There must be morale value in such camp visits, or the War Department wouldn't ask for them and the Hollywood Victory Committee wouldn't assign players to make the trips.

The issue I raise is greater than that involving any personal feelings. It concerns the fundamental morale, both of the men in training and those who are serving or have served overseas.

I know all too well that it is no fun to be under fire from an agency of your government. Yet, it is gratifying to feel that the thing you have been criticized for is helping to rectify a situation that you know is wrong. A few weeks after my report was published, newspapers carried a dispatch from Salt Lake City stating that "Una Merkel and Chester Morris appeared here today to entertain the soldiers and not an officer of high rank in evidence." The article went on to say that Miss Merkel and Mr. Morris had spent all their time with the enlisted men and that the boys had explained that officers were not paying any attention to them for fear of criticism similar to that recently directed at them by a Hollywood actress.

On reading that, I felt that any barbs thrown at me had been well worthwhile. That was ample salve for my wounds. My report brought about the results that I had hoped it would. Numerous friends of mine who have recently returned from camp tours have told me that the condition has been greatly improved.

In three camps on my tour I was accorded the treatment I wanted and expected. In one instance I was turned over to a cadet, a private, and a WAC. I really met the men at that camp. In another camp I was turned over to a sergeant in a jeep. I shook hands and gave autographs to hundreds of the men. That was the job I had set out to do. That was my own small contribution to the war effort. I felt that I was really accomplishing something.

I hope that when I am privileged to go out on a camp tour again I will find the situation everywhere as it existed in these three camps I've just mentioned. If I do, I shall be glad to proclaim it from the housetops. If I don't—if I find the same "rank" condition—then I'll start crusading again. The right of free speech is one of the liberties for which democracy is fighting. Personally, I feel if I were to let "pressure" keep me from one word of truth, I would be failing in my duty—to our country, and to the courage for which it stands.

The End.

PICTURE GUIDE

LADY IN THE DARK (Paramount) finds Ginger Rogers in the role of Liza Elliott, the lady who had difficulty in making up her mind. Gertrude Lawrence created Liza on the New York stage to much acclaim, but the part is much paler on the screen for all of its dazzling Technicolor. Ginger intelligently plays the neurotic editor of an ultra-smart fashion magazine, without ever having a chance of making the character mean much. There is no novelty to looking in on dreams in pictures, for they are old camera stuff. Gone is the charm for the slick staging of the play. Gone, too, is the greater part of its delightful comedy.

Ginger sings "Jenny," she indifferently dances in the clouds, and her Liza hears that haunting strain of a forgotten song of childhood. Otherwise the fanciful music is replaced by sterner drama, and you may quickly become impatient with Liza for not knowing that Charley Johnson is her true love. The older publisher and the visiting star from Hollywood are easily recognizable as also-rans. There is a lavish display of gorgeous feminine styles in "Lady in the Dark"—in case you care.

Ray Milland has quite a bit the best of things because his Charley Johnson is flesh and blood. Warner Baxter appears pleasingly as the publisher, and Jon Hall is the "beautiful hunk of man" from Hollywood, the assignment in which Victor Mature made such a hit on Broadway. Mischa Auer is fairly lost as the too-too photographer. It is obvious that the picture was made at great expense—but it still doesn't quite come off.

THE HEAVENLY BODY (MGM) has nothing to do with bathing. It is a marital farce about an astronomer's wife who has to compete for his affections with a comet he has discovered. Innocently she takes up astrology, which she confuses with the exact science her husband follows. The horoscope she has cast predicts that she will meet her real love at a specified time. And at that moment, the air-raid warden walks in!

This leads to light, fluffy complications which are expertly played by William Powell and Hedy Lamarr as the astronomer and his wife. Bill continues to get his laughs with polished smoothness, and Hedy displays a brand of beauty that should put a mere comet to shame. James Craig is the air-raid warden, Fay Bainter the horoscope caster, and Spring Byington a fluttery neighbor.

THE LODGER (20th Century-Fox) misses the powerful suspense that lifted the novel by Mrs. Marie Belloc Lowndes to the ranks of mystery classics. As you doubtless recall, the book dealt with the psychological horror of a family who believed they had rented rooms to Jack, the Ripper, London's most notorious murderer who terrorized the Whitechapel district in 1888 and 1889.

This picture is very faithful to its period, but it takes the liberty of showing the capture of Jack, the Ripper, and introduces a pattern for the murders by imagining a personal vendetta against theatrical figures. Laird Cregar over-acts his role of the Ripper in the final moments, and Merle Oberon and George Sanders haven't much to do in carrying a slim love thread.

PREVIOUSLY RECOMMENDED

SONG OF BERNADETTE (20th Century-Fox) a spiritually uplifting screen masterpiece that tells of miracles wrought by indestructible faith. Jennifer Jones, in her debut, gives a glorious performance.

TENDER COMRADE (RKO) in glowing tribute to the service widows whose men have left them to carry on for America, Ginger Rogers attains the finest portrayal of her career.

MADAME CURIE (MGM) Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon as Marie and Pierre Curie play an exquisite love drama to the accompaniment of the discovery of radium.

A GUY NAMED JOE (MGM) dedicated to the heartening notion that "pilots never die," but return to earth as guides to tyro aviators. Distinguished fantasy with Spencer Tracy, Irene Dunne and Van Johnson.

DESTINATION TOKYO (Warners) one of the most exciting adventures in courage that this war has so far brought to films. Cary Grant commands the submarine crew

GUNG HO (Universal) the story of Carlson's Marine Raiders in the stunning page of history they wrote in the attack on Makin Island.

HAPPY LAND (20th Century-Fox) an inspiring reavowal of treasured American memories which you dare not miss seeing and remembering.

LOST ANGEL (MGM) little Margaret O'Brien in a little heartwarming entertainment that is a joy to behold and a minor gem of the season.

JANE EYRE (20th Century-Fox) Charlotte Brontë's classic novel is filmed unforgettably and superbly performed by Joan Fontaine.

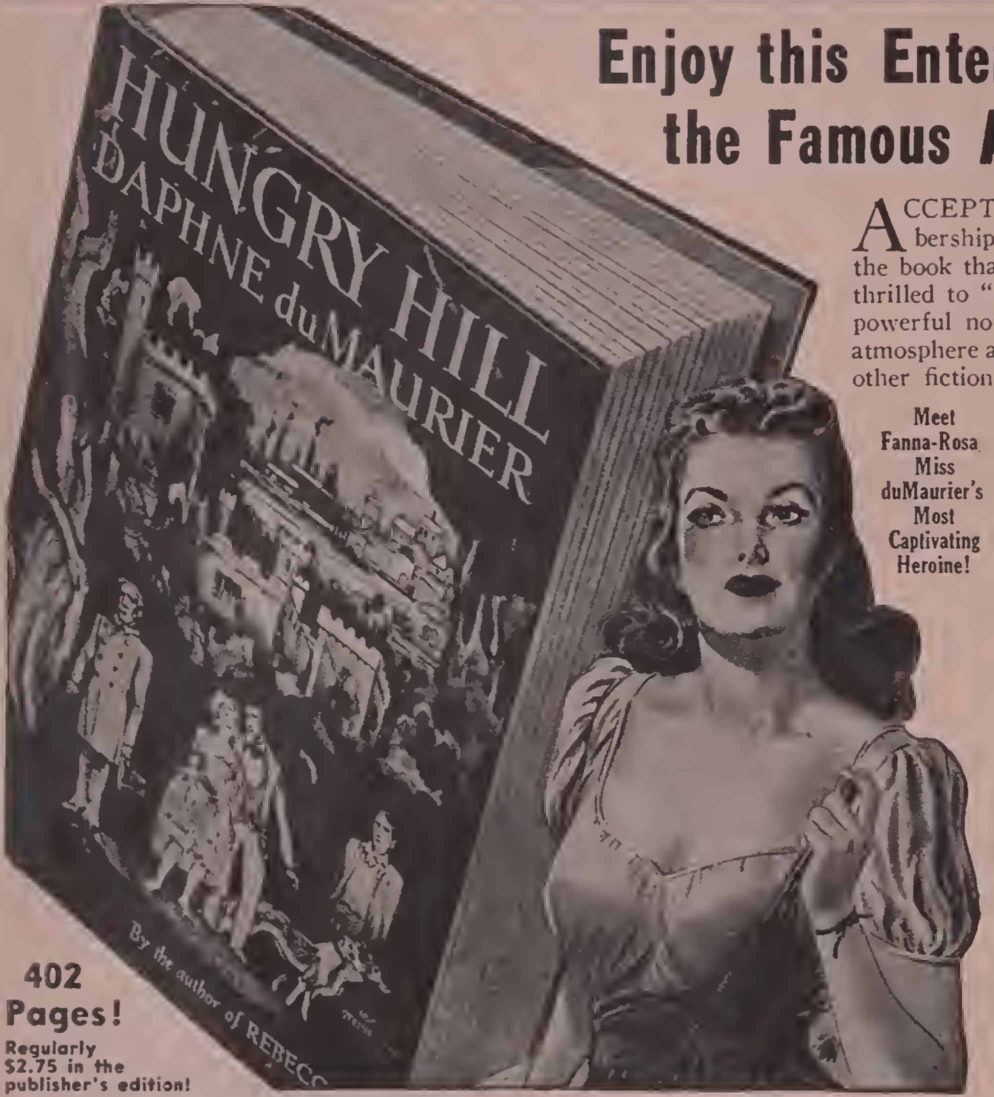
HUNGRY HILL

Enjoy this Entertaining Best-Seller by the Famous Author of "REBECCA"



402 Pages!

Regularly $2.75 in the publisher's edition!

ACCEPT this sensational best-seller FREE with membership in the Dollar Book Club! "Hungry Hill" is the book that has been eagerly awaited by every reader who thrilled to "Rebecca" and "Frenchman's Creek." It is a big, powerful novel with all the color and brilliant handling of atmosphere and character which has marked Miss duMaurier's other fiction successes.

Meet Fanna-Rosa Miss duMaurier's Most Captivating Heroine!

The story of "Hungry Hill" is centered in the bitter struggle between two Irish countryside families—the self-righteous, progressive, and smug Brodricks and their sly, improvident and vicious neighbors, the Donovans. A quarrel in which a Donovan shoots down Copper John's father starts a feud which is to last for generations. Into this tense and dramatic setting walks Fanny-Rosa Flower, the green-eyed, careless beauty, bringing a wild, irresponsible charm that finds a target in the heart of Copper John's son John—and throws a new and disconcerting element into the lives of the staid Brodricks. The romance of Fanny-Rosa and John creates a combination of opposing temperaments that leads to an absorbing and suspenseful climax.

"Hungry Hill" is a novel in the great tradition, dealing with the lives of several generations, rich in fascinating characters and unusual situations. Although it sells regularly in the publisher's edition for $2.75, you may have a copy FREE if you join the Dollar Book Club now. Read full details below.

SHIRLEY COOK

Whoever said "you're only young once" forgot to specify how long that best-of-all time lasts. Once is not enough if once means here today and gone tomorrow. That's why youth should have a Handle With Care sign. And why you should never say "I'm too young to worry about wrinkles."

True enough, worry never prevented lines and crows feet. But care and foresight can. Take sun-squint—(and summer's not far off!). Always, if you're in a direct glare, wear an efficient pair of sun glasses. Professionally ground lenses tone down those blinding rays so you can face them without flinching—and screwing up your eyelids.

Remember, too, that warm winds and healthy heat are drying. Supplement stolen natural oils with dry skin cream—around your eyes and between them, on thin-skinned cheeks and flexible mouth muscles. Twenty minutes of lubrication each day, seven days a week, helps to smooth away a network of frowns.

Speaking of frowns . . . deadpans are dull: on the other hand, a "crinkled" face covering is far from glamorous. Somewhere in between there's a happy medium, a combination of expression and control. Watch your favorite star. She has learned to use her facial muscles, well, but wisely, to react to emotion spontaneously, without obvious stress or strain.

Dancing 'til dawn—there's nothing like it! If you can sleep long and soundly next day. If not, that smooth young skin will suffer. Late nights can add up to early jitters—and their accompanying tell-tale signs.

Good looks stay lovelier longer if you "rest, relax and restore." Rest your body and mind eight or nine hours every night. Relax taut nerves with frequent changes of activity, refreshing exercise and soothing baths. Restore oil and moisture to weather-beaten skin with creams and lotions.

The greatest star of the screen!

"Gaslight" is no gentle flicker.

★ ★ ★ ★

An almost unholy light blazes about this drama of emotional conflict which comes to the screen by way of MGM.

★ ★ ★ ★

Charles Boyer, Ingrid Bergman and Joseph Cotten are the incandescent threesome.

★ ★ ★ ★

And theirs is a most unusual love story, set against a dark design for living.

For Ingrid Bergman—those bells will toll again—with a clamour of applause.

★ ★ ★ ★

Charles Boyer, whose gleaming eye has held many a feminine heart in mid-beat, adds to his strong fascination, a strangely compelling quality.

★ ★ ★ ★

Credit MGM for bringing out the sinister facet and adding to the Boyer drawing power.

★ ★ ★ ★

And put another halo around the brilliant head of George Cukor for his splendid interpretation of "Gaslight".

★ ★ ★ ★

It's the kind of direction you'd expect from the man who guided "Philadelphia Story", and many other MGM triumphs.

★ ★ ★ ★

Something else to look forward to: Dame May Whitty's performance and that of newcomer Angela Lansbury (she's luscious but not angelic).

★ ★ ★ ★

While we're laurel-tossing, we present one to Arthur Hornblow, Jr., producer, and another to John Van Druten, who adapted the screen play from the stage hit.

"Gaslight" holds the mysterious, threatening quality of a dark thought on a black night.

IT'S A Young IDEA

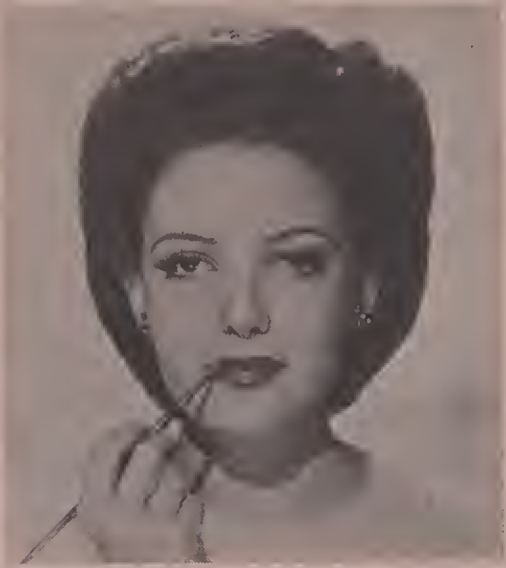
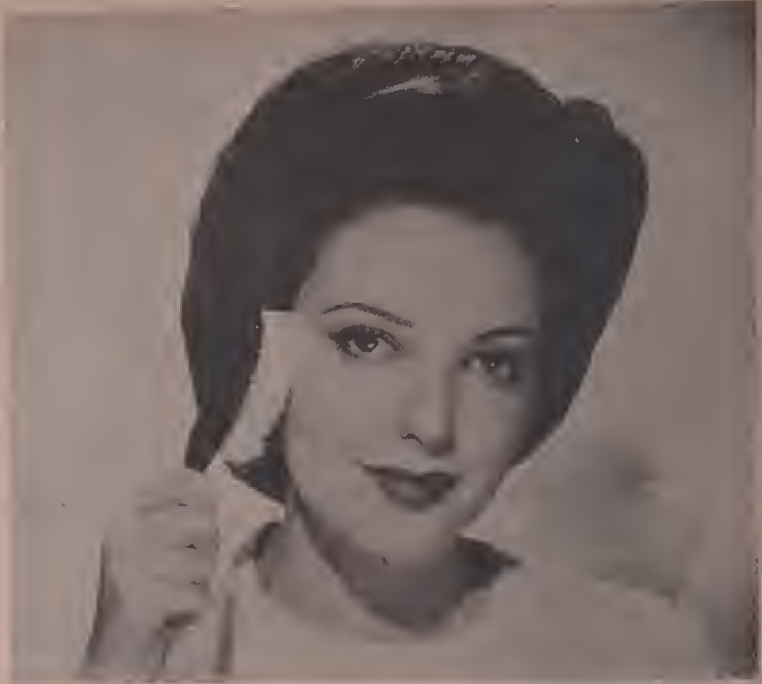
BY SHIRLEY COOK

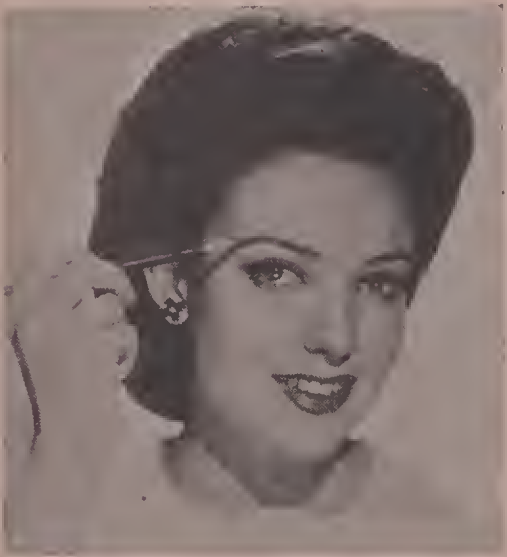
BEAUTY EDITOR



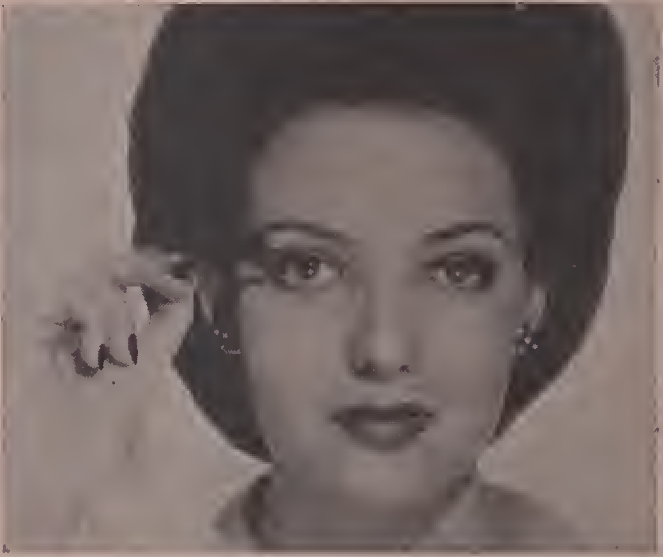
To keep a natural, clean-cut lip line. If you use the brush technique, start at the corners and carry lipstick upward to center of mouth.



To apply dry rouge so that it's just a glow of healthy, vibrant color. Linda prevents any obvious line of demarcation by patting her rouge over cheekbones and blending it up and out with a soft-bristled brush.



To accentuate your eyebrows. Keep the normal arch and featherstroke it lightly, using a soft pencil for the short hair-length strokes.



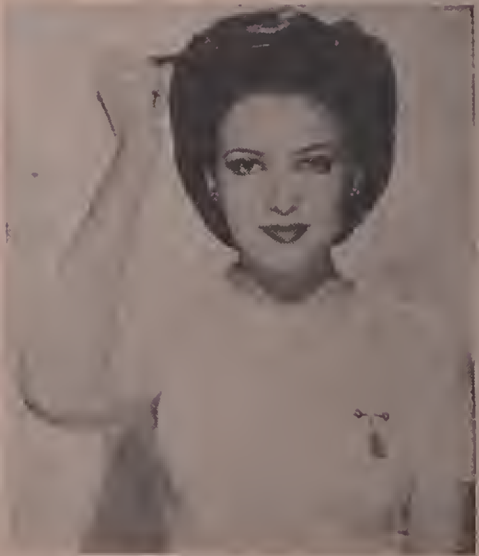
To dramatize your eyes. Mascara, applied with a damp brush, and stroked from base to tips, does it.

THE older they get, the younger the look! That's not double talk. It's a short short story of the development of cosmetics.

For many years, our beauty aids have been undergoing a process of refinement and perfection. The best faces no longer wear painted pouts, beaded lashes or china doll cheeks. Instead, they take to the modern practical approach.

Glamour has to be combined with grooming if it is to spell "natural combustion, 1944 style." And Linda Darnell, who stars in the Arnold Pressburger production "It Happened Tomorrow," is pictured here to prove it!

Linda, lovely as she is, young as she is, takes advantage of every trick in a well-chosen beauty bag. Make-up base protects her skin while priming it for prettying. Powder performs effectively: to point up flesh tints, tone down shine, and set the color of her cheek and lip rouge. Her eyes and mouth remain her own, with only a discreet accent to make them even more so. Protesting parents, self-satisfied sophomores—please note. Artificiality is aging. But beauty is a young idea, the very idea today's face-flattering cosmetics can best express.



To bare a lovely brow. Linda chooses a smooth-swept coiffure and uses her rat tail comb to deepen its softening front waves.

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

STAR PRAISES PRODUCER!

When a star raves about her producer, that's news.

Claudette Colbert can't sing the praises of David O. Selznick high enough to equal her enthusiasm. CC has just finished work on "Since You Went Away" and regards it not only as the best pictures she herself has ever done but one of the best ever made.

"That man," she sighs, meaning David O. "He hired great actors like Lionel Barrymore, Charles Coburn, Albert Basserman just for one day's work. He brought out the most wondeful acting from me, from Shirley Temple, from Jennifer Jones. Monty Woolley has never been better. Whenever I thought a scene was awkward, I'd tell David and he'd quietly sit down in a corner, rewrite it and come up with something wonderful."

The amusing part of Miss Colbert's raves is that, while working, she and Selznick always quarrel violently, yet fundamentally they understand and respect one another deeply.

As an example of their friendship for one another, on the night before Lt. Commander Pressman, Claudette's doctor-husband, was due to depart on military duty for many months, Selznick ran off "Since You Went Away" just for this devoted couple. The film was unscored. All the "additional" sounds, like the slamming of doors, train whistles and such, were lacking as well as many of the scenes and all the credit titles.

"But Jack and I sat there," Claudette says, "holding hands, like any pair of kids at the movies, crying our eyes out."

GENEROUS GUY

You could expect, however, if you knew him at all, that Cary Grant would behave exactly as he did toward pretty Janet Blair.

Janet is Cary's leading woman in "Curley." Cary's leading women, such like as Roz Russell and Irene Dunne, always cry to work with him. Now Janet joins that society.

This is why. Janet's role in "Curly," while it was the feminine lead, was still so small as to be practically invisible. Cary said nothing until the shooting of the film was nearly over. Then came a scene in which he was supposed to rant and rave.

He went to Director Al Hall. "Janet should be the angry one here," he said. "Let her do the raving. Let me just sit back and take it. Scene will be much better that way."

Al Hall is an agreeable guy, anyhow, but even if he weren't Cary is so red hot at the box-office he could get away with ordering the studio burned to the ground.

So, of course, Janet got her scene. It changed her part from being merely namby-pamby into the sort that critics go for.

It takes a mighty generous guy, who not only withstands competition, but creates it.

TIP FOR THE GIRLS

Paulette Goddard always slays them. At a recent golf tournament (entrance fee, war bonds) Paulette was asked, along with some other glamour items, to help referee the game between Bob Hope and Bing Crosby. Other girls turned up wearing smart sports dresses. La Goddard came in a checked sport coat and matching shorts. And I do mean short.

Of course, all the photographers neglected to shoot the other glamour items and centered on Goddard. That girl always grabs the space with some unusual costume, which isn't a bad tip for other girls in other towns.

DATING OF THE MONTH

The dating of the month that shook Hollywood's back teeth was that of Captain Clark Gable and Betty Hutton. The debonaire Irishman who is vice-president of M-G-M, Eddie Mannix, introduced the dynamic pair and dinner for two has been very much in order on several occasions since.

As a matter of fact, Glamour Corners has been knocking itself out trying to get Gable romanced ever since he returned from England. At first the chat-

Movieland's NEW

BROADWAY RHYTHM (MGM) has all the earmarks of an extravagant musical superduper. If your enjoyment of a picture depends upon the merits of the story it tells, "Broadway Rhythm" is decidedly not your dish. But if you are satisfied to accept a lightweight plot simply for what it is—an excuse to bring together and parade a wealth of clever talent—then here is a presentation that will give you your full money's worth, and in Technicolor, too.

Young Gloria DeHaven emerges to make a bid for stardom with an engaging performance of a stage-struck girl who has plenty to offer. Her ambitions are being held down by George Murphy as her producer brother and slyly encouraged by Charles Winninger as her show-wise father, a veteran of vaudeville. Ginny Simms characterizes a Hollywood star with Broadway aspirations, and between them they carry what is left of the New York musical comedy about the summer stock theatres which was once called "Very Warm for May."

Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra take care of the featured band spot, and there are scorching sepia song specialists by Lena Horne and Hazel Scott. Eddie "Rochester" Anderson adds to the merriment, as do Ben Blue and Nancy Walker, and that show-stopping impersonator is Dean Murphy, long a favorite of F. D. R., whom he takes off remarkably. "Broadway Rhythm" is both tuneful and eye-filling, which is all it set out to be.

THE HOUR BEFORE THE DAWN (Paramount) labors over the problem of awakening an English gentleman who fancies himself a conscientious objector to killing of any sort, even though his country is at war. His aversion stems from an incident in childhood when in target shooting he was accidentally responsible for the death of a favorite Collie dog. He grows up to become a teacher and suffers grievous embarrassments rather than be untrue to his convictions. Not until he traps his German-born wife in a flagrant act of sabotage does he come around to a way of thinking that in a flash sends him to join his brother in the R.A.F.

The story is from a novel by W. Somerset Maugham, yet its screen transcription is excessively slow moving and unconvincing despite the fine efforts of Franchot Tone to make valid his objections to war. Purposely, real issues are treated sketchily for fear of offense, a sin of omissions which causes the drama to defeat itself. Veronica Lake is not very good as the German girl spy and frequently forgets her slight accent. John Sutton, Binnie Barnes and Henry Stephenson are among others concerned, but where did they get that stilted boy who plays the nephew of Tone? All in all, you need not stay up for "The Hour Before the Dawn."

VOICE IN THE WIND (United Artists) is filled with studied effects in dim gray photography and is ponderous with long silences that are supposed to speak louder than words. The scene is the West Indies island of Guadeloupe, a haven of refugees from Hitler's conquests; the central characters are a Czech concert pianist and the girl who was his fiancee. He has lost his mind following his escape from the captors who arrested him for deliberately playing a verboten patriotic selection. She is dying of heart-break, and there they both are on Guadeloupe, each unaware of the other's presence.

PICTURE GUIDE

FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH ON PAGE 56

Francis Lederer is the man, Sigrid Gurie the girl. They are surrounded by some accomplished character actors such as J. Carroll Naish, Alexander Granach and J. Edward Bromberg. For the arty minded picturegoers, "Voice in the Wind" will be a delight into which can be read meanings that will breeze right by the average entertainment seekers.

THE IMPOSTOR (Universal) is an ace war melodrama about a criminal's regeneration through joining the fighting forces of the Free French. He is a murderer awaiting execution on the guillotine who makes good his escape when the prison is bombed by the Nazis. He assumes the identity of a dead French sergeant and finds himself among a group of demobilized soldiers headed for Dakar. At the call to arms by General De Gaulle, the destination is changed to Equatorial Africa where the Impostor learns the meaning of patriotism and distinguishes himself in jungle warfare, only to face the exposure of his masquerade.

Through one of those stranger-than-fiction incidents, the star of the picture, Jean Gabin, is now actually on active duty in service of the Free French. He gives an especially strong performance in the film, sharply supported by the excellent portrayals of John Qualen, Richard Whorf, Allyn Joslyn, Peter Van Eyck and Eddie Quillan who are his companions in the adventure. You will find the drama Gabin enacts very much worth your while.

KNICKERBOCKER HOLIDAY (United Artists) follows pretty closely the comic operetta from which it was adapted. It was a success of pleasant memory when presented five years ago on the New York stage, but by virtue of its style, something of an oddity for the screen. This is partly because the characters assume the privilege of bursting into song at the least provocation. They sing of love or of political corruption, for this is a satire upon the pioneer settlement of New Amsterdam during the Colonial period when Peg-leg Peter Stuyvesant arrived to take over the governorship. Unfortunately the satire is not particularly pointed and may escape many who will not see its likeness to the Gilbert and Sullivan comicalities.

Charles Coburn has a grand time vocalizing and stumping around as Peg-leg Peter. Nelson Eddy is the resourceful Brom Broeck who will not knuckle down to oppression. Constance Dowling appears pertly as the girl both of these men want to marry. "Knickerbocker Holiday" is one about which you will have to decide for yourself. We didn't care for it.

SHINE ON HARVEST MOON (Warners) is that familiar story of the small-time vaudeville team, struggling to get into the big-time. The picture sees fit to call the girl "Nora Bayes" and the man "Jack Norworth," although neither Ann Sheridan nor Dennis Morgan lends much credence to recollections of these famed real-life entertainers. But with Irene Manning, Jack Carson and Marie Wilson to help, some two-dozen old-time songs get indifferently sung for another of those nostalgic cavalcades of once popular tunes—vintage 1906.

ACTION IN ARABIA (RKO) sends George Sanders out to foil a plot of the Nazis to turn the Arab tribes against the Allies. He is an American newspaperman on vacation in Damascus. After his pal is knifed, he is plunged into a tense and complicated situation because he is never sure whom he can trust. Two lovely ladies, Virginia Bruce and Lenore Aubert, lend him aid, but he can't bank on the loyalty of the information-selling Gene Lockhart. You can take "Action in Arabia" with a tongue in your cheek, for it doesn't take itself too seriously.

Loses 25 pounds—
reveals her hidden beauty

"I wondered if such a thing could happen to me," says Audrey Helmer of Prospect, N. Y.

WHEN Audrey Helmer was 16, she weighed 116 and was slim as a reed. But the last two years in high school she began putting on the pounds. She went to college weighing 129, and graduated at 145 in a size 18 dress. The college nurse told her she ought to reduce—and she tried it again and again, without much success.

Then she got her first school, and that's when the weight wears you down. On your feet all day, at the blackboard, before the class—and 30 pairs of appraising eyes. At social affairs, where everyone in the neighborhood sizes up teacher. Audrey decided to do something about it—and those DuBarry Success Course pictures haunted, tempted, convinced her. What she liked about it was the plan worked out for her. "Eating as a beauty eats," enjoyable exercises she could do after school, beauty rituals that highlighted her mornings and evenings. Following the Course faithfully, she lost 25 pounds, won back the perfect figure that was hers at sixteen, and now she slips easily into a size 12 dress.

"The Success Course has been a revelation to me," says Audrey Helmer. "I am healthier, happier, more enthusiastic than ever before. My hair and complexion have greatly improved—and I know how to care for them always. This is more than a Course—it's a new way of living that will be the basis for my entire life."

Audrey reduced her waist and abdomen 3" each, her hips 5", through new beauty knowledge, makes the most of natural loveliness.

Be Fit and Fair—
Top to Toe!

Whether you work as a teacher, in a defense plant, in an office, or at home—today it's important to be at your best. The Success Course brings you an analysis of your needs, then shows you how to bring your weight to normal; remodel your figure; care for your skin; use make-up for subtlety and glamour. You follow the same methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon, New York. And with your Course, at not a penny of extra cost, you receive a generous supply of lovely DuBarry Beauty and Make-up Preparations.

Audrey Helmer weighed 25 pounds too much for her height (5' 3") but in her face and figure there was hidden beauty that only needed a chance.

WORDS of MUSIC

BY JILL WARREN

Corp. Cliff Howell sews stripes on Frances Langford, making her an honorary sergeant in ceremony at Gardner Field, California.

Hi, Characters! Music Class is in session, and there is much business at hand. So if everyone has his pitch pipe, we shall be off!

THE TUNEFILMS:

Twentieth Century-Fox had a fast change of mind in their casting office. They took Lynn Bari out of the lineup for "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling," and gave her the singing lead in the Benny Goodman picture, "Sweet and Lowdown." Then they switched Perry Como from "The Bowery" to "Something For The Boys," with Vivian Blaine as his leading lady. Incidentally, Perry really had a time in getting to the coast from N. Y. He was put off the plane at practically every stop and finally made the last lap by train, the whole trip taking him a week and a half. Then the day he arrived in "sunny California" it was pouring . . .

Universal is still pitching us those good musical shorts of theirs, and the newest one is called "Stars and Violins." Answering the roll call are Jack Teagarden and his band, Jo Stafford and the Pied Pipers, Lillian Cornell, and Jimmy Cash, the Burns and Allen troubadour. The Teagarden man and his trombone are featured on "Basin Street Blues," and a new instrumental number, "Swing On a Teagarden Gate."

Bob Crosby and Connie Haines are the newest additions to the Universal payroll. Bob and his band will have a big spot in Gloria Jean's starring picture, "Pardon My Rhythm," and Connie will appear in "Moon Over Las Vegas."

Les Brown and his orchestra were to have been part of Paramount's "Bring On The Girls," but the starting date of the picture conflicted with playing dates Les had already signed for his band, so Paramount extended his contract and will use him in another film later in the year. In the meantime Les is doing theatres.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

The recording companies have an exceptionally large number of releases for us this month, for which hooray! We'll start with DECCA: Bing Crosby's latest is the David Rose composition, "Poinciana," and "San Fernando Valley," with music by John Scott Trotter. The "Valley" tune is the hit novelty written by radio conductor Gordon Jenkins . . . Hildegarde, with the assistance of Harry Sosnick's orchestra, has done "Suddenly It's Spring," from "Lady in The Dark," and "Leave Us Face It" (We're In Love). This is the song which jumped to popularity in such a hurry after its first appearance on "Duffy's Tavern." To quote Ed "Archie" Gardner, "It's the greatest love song in captivity." . . . Decca's newest album release is "One Touch Of Venus," recorded by Mary Martin, Kenny Baker, and the original chorus and orchestra from the show. There are five records in all . . . The Merry Macs are back with us again, this time on "Mairzy Doats" and "I've Got Ten Bucks and Twenty Four Hours Leave." They are backed up by their usual small combination . . . Jerry Wald, whose band is rising in popularity, has waxed "Poinciana" as an instrumental, and "Mississippi Dreamboat." Dick Merrick sings the vocal chorus on "Dreamboat," with both sides spotlighting the Wald clarinet . . . The Ink Spots and Ella Fitzgerald get together for the first time on records to give us "Cow Cow Boogie" and the reverse side has Ella, with her own band, singing "When My Sugar Walks Down The Street."

Helen Forrest signed a three-year contract with Decca so before long we should be hearing her first disc. And I wouldn't be surprised if she did a couple of double things with Dick Haymes, which wouldn't be a bad combination at all, at all . . . COLUMBIA confronts us with a fine album called "Frankie Carle and His Gal Friends." Needless to say, they are all piano solos done in the famous Carle style, accompanied by bass and guitar. Frankie's

The Great GRANT

Other actors dream about selecting their own roles. Cary does it. Some stars think how wonderful it would be never to have a bad picture. All Cary's pictures, most personally selected, are terrific hits. Then there's that ideal of shifting from comedy to drama and back again. Few players ever manage it. But Mr. Grant manages. Finally there's that perfect stage of being blissfully married to a beautiful girl. That's a description of Cary's union with Barbara Hutton. It should add up to making him conceited and difficult. Instead, this naturalized American who was born Archie Leach of England, becomes steadily more handsome, more skillful, more unselfish and more generous. He's a very great guy, this Grant.

They're Mr. and Mrs. now—
Private Donald O'Connor,
U. S. Army, and Gwen Carter, movieland's happiest twosome.

Donald O'Connor's BOBBY SOX BRIDE

BY DONALD O'CONNOR

Mr. Big didn't believe in love at first sight—

Then came an evening back stage and a girl named Gwen

I'M GOING into service, a married man! Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!

That wonderful Gwen Carter, whom I met in January, 1943, and fell in love with at sight, is now, after a Sunday trip to Tijuana, Mexico, Mrs. Donald O'Connor.

And to top that—yes, it even tops my marriage—I'm entering the greatest show on earth, our battle for democracy.

I hope I'll be put somewhere I can best serve. For besides fighting for peace, for freedom, for a better world for me, I want to help make this world a better place for Gwen. She is my future. I'm sure Fate decided the minute I met her.

Backstage at the "Blackouts", a Hollywood stage show, I was watching a rehearsal. Gwen was there waiting for her Dad, who is the orchestra leader. She was watching too. I got myself introduced but not encouraged. I spent the following two days tracking down her telephone number. She was very popular. And the other guys she went with weren't anxious to help me out.

But finally I got a call through. We went to dinner and then to see a movie at Grauman's Chinese Theatre. That was more than a year ago. Since then neither of us ever even dated anyone else. I'd always laughed about "love at first sight", but I knew at once that this was it. From that evening on, we crowded the thirteen months with lots of fun. Our romance advanced to the engagement stage and Gwen began wearing that emerald cut diamond with baguettes on the side. Our parents thought marriage should wait. But we were earnest and kept trying to win our point. After all, my Mom married at fourteen and there's never been a divorce in the O'Connor family. They finally gave their blessings. Now Gwen wears two rings on her finger.

On her way home from school Gwen got the groceries. Married on Sunday, Gwen was right back in classes Monday. Donald had been inducted into the army on same day.

Gwen (right) with her closest friend, Beverly Woodcock, is a typical modern high school kid. Movieland snapped her as school day ended at Los Angeles High. She wears sloppy Joe sweater.

Gwen swears she's a fine cook, but being meatless Tuesday when Movieland's cameraman caught her, new bride was whipping up a patriotic omelet for dinner.

DONALD O'CONNOR

Donald, the ardent puddle jumper, cutting quite a cute figure in his bathing suit.

This is the talented young movie star, now Private Donald O'Connor, U. S. Army, and mighty proud, too.

The most recent addition is a band of diamonds that proves she's my wife. By summertime, when Gwen's school is out, we hope we'll be together, wherever I'm stationed.

Now that my future is set I am thinking of my past, saying goodbye to it really.

What a past it's been! Things like this:

When I was knee-high to a pygmy I worked with a Trampoline act in vaudeville. In case you are not familiar with vaudeville jive, trampolinists use a big table, jump on it and do somersaults. First time I tried it I came down on my head. I've been this way ever since.

Yet I've lived and learned for eighteen years, acrobatic years. My learning may have been a bit irregular—but solid.

For example: A roller-skating act taught me to roller-skate. Then I worked with an ice-skating troupe and they put me on the road to being a male Sonja Henie. When we worked circus acts, I learned how to ride, bare-back and Western saddle and on my head, balanced on my big and several other which-ways. Sleight-of-hand acts gave me speed and tempo. My brothers taught me hand-balancing. Mom put me through dance routines. From the age of nine months on, I rode in parades at fairs and carnivals, tall silk hat and all. Gives a man presence, riding in parades.

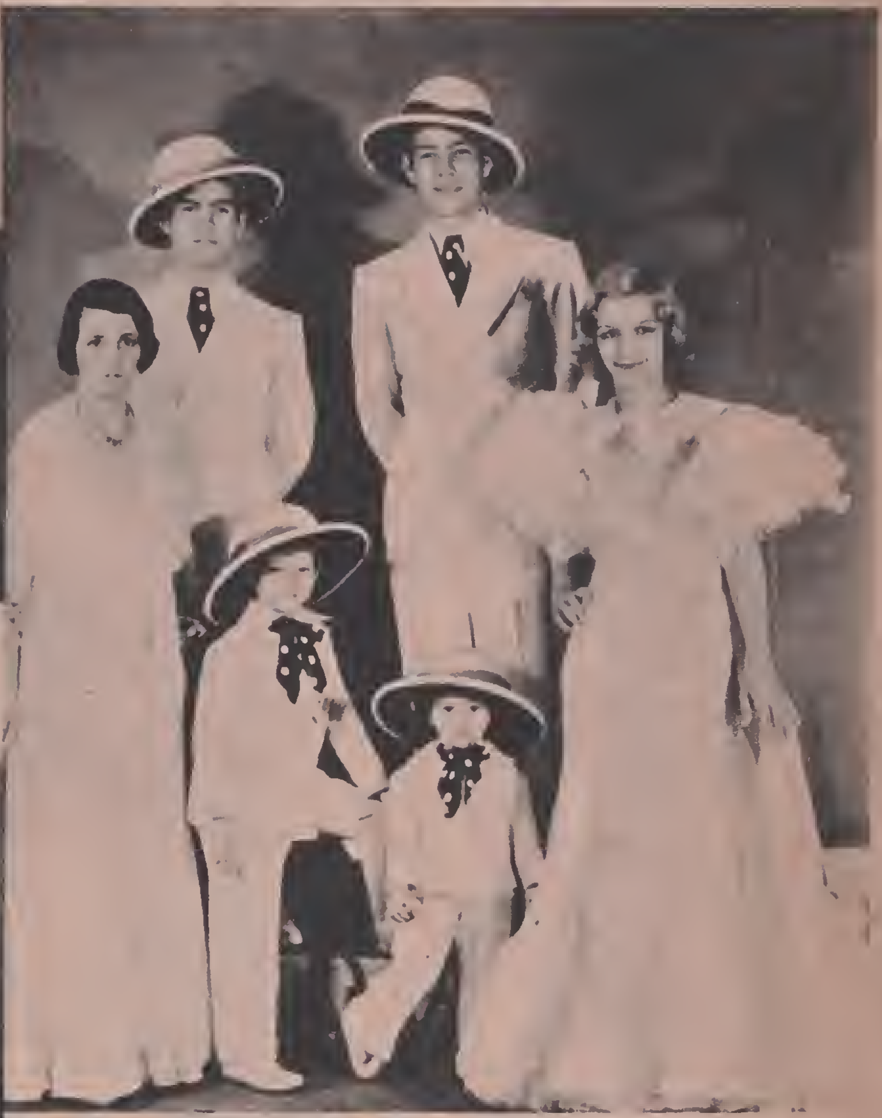
By the time I was four, I was running around with a midget in New York. He was a middle-aged midget, and a nifty dresser. I dressed like him. I strutted my stuff in spats, a full-dress suit, a cane and a flower in my button-hole. When I first got the cane, it was taller than I was. I wore my hair, blonde as Betty Grable's, Buster Brown style, with bangs. And I always sported a diamond ring—except when it was in hock.

One time a crowd of boys in Omaha, Nebraska, tried to take my ring from me after I'd got them into the theater free. I whaled the daylights out of three of the gang. Then I went backstage and cried my eyes out. I felt sick. I didn't know till years later that I was "disillusioned."

I was ten years old before I got into a real kindergarten. But when I was eleven, I was in the third grade. The gag was I had gone to school by correspondence that year. Lessons were sent to me by a Chicago Professional School and my classrooms were dressing rooms in theaters and the dingy bedrooms in the hotels where my folks stayed. I'd sit beside my mother, doing my Three R's, and when her back was turned, I'd mix lip rouge and cold cream and eyebrow pencil into a gooey mass and paint pictures on the walls. There are a lot of "Early O'Connors" splattered around the country.

Actually, of course, I was born in St. Elizabeth's Hospital, in Chicago, on August 30, 1925. One of my mother's best friends at the time was Martha Raye's mother. Martha's mother named me Donald. The family tagged me with two other Ds besides; David and Dixon. I wanted to be called Dixon because, when I was six, a numerologist told me it would bring me luck. By then it was too late, though, and the "Donald" stuck.

Age seven, all set for success, Donald was already dancing, singing, doing acrobatics and playing comedy.



The O'Connors as they appeared in "Bombay Unit." Donald and his niece, Patsy, are the kids in center, his mother stands at their right, then brothers Billy and Jack and sister Arlene.

At twelve, making his first big time hit in "Sing You Sinners" with Bing Crosby and Fred MacMurray Greasepaint is in my veins, to coin a phrase. My Dad, John E. "Chuck" Connors, came over from County Cork, Ireland, with his brother Bill, when they were mere broths of lads. Soon as they got here, they went into the circus and carnival business. Then Uncle Bill got married, quit show business, worked as a miner, settled in Danville, Illinois, and had thirteen children. Uncle Bill's place in Danville is the only real home I ever had, until I hit Hollywood.

Not that I wanted a home. Even after I came to Hollywood and was able to buy one, I didn't especially want one. A house felt too much like settling down. I hate routine. I hate having to be here at six, dinner at seven, there at eight. So I bought a house, sure, that's right, and live in it with my mother. But I bought it for Mom.

After Uncle Bill married, my Dad went on alone. As "Chuck" Connors, he starred as a professional strong man and boxer, working a circus with the great English pugilist, Peter Maher. He married my mother, Effie Irene Crane, when she was fourteen years old. After he married, he changed his (Continued on page 72)

TWO BEAUTIFUL ROMANTIC PEOPLE

THE GIRL (ON MOVIELAND'S COVER) . . . LANA TURNER

MY EARLIEST AMBITION:

Was to design clothes.

When I was nine, I sketched a dress and explained it to my mother, who got the idea. I used to love to watch my mother dress; she had pretty things and knew how to put them on. My favorite occupation throughout my school days was dreaming up lovely clothes. I still design some of my own wardrobe.

I USED TO WISH I COULD:

Wiggle my ears. My grandfather could wiggle his, and so could his son, my mother's half-brother.

Whistle through my teeth; my mother can.

Win a tennis tournament. I finally won a tournament—perhaps because I had a grand partner, but I still can't whistle or wiggle my ears!

MY EARLIEST RECOLLECTION:

Is an Easter egg hunt.

The memory is blurred but we were hunting colored eggs all over a green lawn, falling over each other, putting our finds into rainbow-hued baskets. Then we had to hunt for the bunny that had hidden the eggs. I remember I didn't find it, and was much—and vocally—annoyed.

I LIKE:

Sweaters, but I seldom wear one; if I do, people are apt to look at me and say, "Oh ho, Sweater Girl!" So I'm self-conscious about putting one on. But I loathe those Sloppy Joe sweaters. What they do to the kids who wear them isn't funny!

Milk with ice cubes in it (especially on a hot day); white-walled tires; Irish stew; murder mysteries; luscious-looking clothes, and Gossip—sometimes, when it's just among close friends and isn't malicious and lots of other people know it. I don't like the feeling that I have a terrific secret and mustn't spill it. Oh—just nice, silly, gay gossip.

I DON'T LIKE:

Polka dots; grease paint; sea gulls; cold plunges; cider; going fishing. I went fishing once for barracuda. My fishing partner hauled in one after another, and all I could catch was mackerel. I wound up by falling into the ocean and vowing I'd never fish again.

I HATE:

Parsnips; mustard greens; being hurried; oatmeal, if I have to eat it. (My mother still says sternly, "You eat that oatmeal!"—and my baby eats hers like a hungry angel.)

I'M CRAZY ABOUT:

Home-made bread.

If I can't get any, I'll settle for a drive past a good bakery, just for a whiff of hot bread as it comes from the oven.

REVEAL THEIR SECRET PERSONALITIES

Myself

THE MAN (TODAY'S GREAT STAR) . . .

ALAN LADD

Alan

I REMEMBER:

A meat stew my mother made when I was seven. We were traveling by car from our home town in Arkansas out to California. We had no money and the trip was a sort of "Grapes of Wrath" affair. For several days we had been hungry, and on this particular day my stepfather had sold his painter's ladder and some brushes and bought the meat. I could smell the fragrance of it as I waited outside our tent while my mother cooked the meal.

Across from us in the shabby little camp was another family with a couple of babies. Perhaps they also had somone old or ill. I remember they called my mother over, and she seemed troubled when she came back. We were gathered around the stove, being served with the delicious-smelling stew, when my mother suddenly decided that the people over the way needed food more than we did. She took the pieces of meat off our plates, left us with bread covered with thick gravy, and gave the meat to them.

That old song, "The Long Long Trail." I was very small. My father, a public accountant in Cleveland, Oklahoma, was away and my mother wanted to surprise him by having me sing his favorite song when he came home. I learned every word of it, could keep the tune, and my mother was quite proud of me. But when my father arrived, I was suddenly smitten with stage fright and crawled under the bed.

Later, I remember something my stepfather said to me. I was big enough to want to earn some money and I asked him to teach me how to paint and let me go out with him on one of his jobs. He wouldn't.

"I don't want you to learn a poorly paying trade like this," he said.

"I want you to know how to make good in a fine position. If you can earn just enough to get by on, at this sort of thing, the time will come when you'll be hard up. You'll decide to do it for a couple of weeks, and at the end of twenty years you'll still be doing it, as I am. No, you must learn to do something better."

I LIKE:

Sunshine; hot weather; singing in the shower; dark brown eyes; my boxer puppy; swimming; a garden full of fresh green things; dancing; white shirts and the color red.

I DISLIKE:

Phoney people; black shoes; new suits; making still pictures; disorder; jelly doughnuts.

I HATE:

Schemers; hats; diamonds; anything smothered in thick gravy; lamb in any disguise.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Being sensitive—maybe too (Continued on page 27)

CONTINUED

"I'm mad about my baby," says Lana. "She's beautiful, adorable, perfect. She has entirely changed my life. I adore that fact."

Lana says, "I've learned the give-and-take of marriage." Here shown with Steve Crane, she's kissed by Mervyn LeRoy, her discoverer.

I HAVE FUN:

Creating things.

I couldn't buy lights or ornaments for my baby's first tree, so I made them for her. I got a silver tree and a bolt of red satin ribbon and tied bows to every branch. It took me three and a half hours to tie them all. Then I scattered silver icicles over the tree, topped it with a white angel above a great green bow, and set a spotlight below to light it. It was but sensational.

I USED TO:

Dream of being able to fly a plane in a coast-to-coast race. I saw myself tearing into a field and calling, "Fill her up, boys!" while I snatched a milkshake or a sandwich and watched them with an eagle eye, then I'd take off like the wind, just a hair's breadth ahead of the next contestant.

Act on impulse. I'd say to myself, "I wish I could go to Palm Springs—Why don't I?" and I was off. Having my baby cured me. Where yesterday I'd be packed and away at a moment's notice, today there's the baby. Will it be good for her? If she goes, I must take her nurse; if I take her nurse, I must take the cook; if I take the cook, I'd better get a house or an apartment. By that time, it's simpler to stay home.

Take things to heart terribly. I'd let things bother me. Now I know what's important, and lesser worries can't get close to me. I won't let myself get upset for the baby's sake.

I LOVE:

Macaroni and cheese. We have it always Tuesdays and Fridays, and we're mad about it.

Fortune tellers. But my husband doesn't like them so I don't go any more. I used to get a kick out of them, not actually believing anything, but I've given it up.

I DON'T LIKE:

A man to walk around with his hands in his pockets.

To hear a woman swear. I'm not prudish. I can forgive it in a great emergency. I used to use bad words myself in the modern fashion. One day I happened to listen to a girl with a sweet, gentle face swearing like a fish-wife. I thought: "Is that how I sound to other people?" and I stopped.

My husband never swears; he said nothing when I did, but when I'd cured myself, he was delighted.

And do you know, I discover I'm learning a whole new vocabulary! Instead of a lazyman's curses, I hunt for words to express exactly what I mean. Steve and I play games with words—I'm a pushover for games! We open a dictionary, put a finger on a word with our eyes shut; then we use the word, properly pronounced in a sentence. We time each other and keep score.

I'VE LEARNED:

From my husband—how to consider others; the give and take of marriage.

From my baby—patience. When you're expecting a child, there's nothing you can do to hurry matters. You must wait. I'd never had any patience before, I wanted everything in a hurry. And when I had to wait I had time to think. I realized that my life must be changed—a mother needs endless patience and I vowed I'd learn to have it.

From making pictures—how to meet important people. I've met the President, governors, great writers, artists, musicians, people who do great things, whom I'd never have met on my own.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Being late.

I'm never late on the set; I'm there at nine o'clock always. But I'm late for appointments and engagements. I try to be on time but I never (Continued on page 64)

CONTINUED

"If I could live over one day of my life," says Alan, "I'd choose my wedding day. I adore my nine-months-old daughter, Alana."

"The turning point in my life," says Laddie, "was the day I met Susie. She was just starting in the agency business. Until that moment we were just two bewildered people."

sensitive; eating garlic (if my wife Susie eats garlic); worrying; grabbing the dinner or luncheon check when I'm out with a party—perhaps because I get such a kick out of being able to afford to pay the check after so long a time of skimping on food.

I LOVE:

People. I don't subscribe to that saying: "The more I see of people, the better I love dogs." Susie and I are so close that we haven't any frightfully intimate pals, but we have lots of friends and we love people. I wish I always understood them. I try to. I never judge them when they don't behave exactly as I'd like, because I'm convinced there's always a reason behind what people do.

If this sounds stuffy, I don't mean it so.

I USED TO:

Hate fog and dark days. They depressed me terribly. I don't mind them now.

Be cynical, during the years I was so often broke, but I'm never cynical now. Oh yes, I still occasionally have the feeling that I may last in pictures only for another two or three weeks, but I'm not bitter about it any more. That's due to Susie.

I BELIEVE:

That any story about myself must be a story about my wife, because we think the same things. Sooo—

SUSIE AND I—

Are both impulsive. Before gas rationing, we used to get up at 2 A.M. and start off for a drive because one of us happened to say how nice it would be to take a look at the spring wildflowers near Bakersfield, or what about a swim up at Lake Arrowhead, or why not run down to San Diego to watch Bing Crosby's horses?

Seldom hear any gossip and practically never know what's going on. Yet we always seem to have so much to tell each other that we never run out of things to say.

Never make detailed plans. We take life as it comes and love to be surprised.

THE TURNING POINT IN MY LIFE:

Was the day I met Susie. She was just starting out in the agency business, and I was just beginning my film career. She heard my voice on the radio—I was doing a scene in which I played two people, an old man and his son. She was impressed and asked me to come in to see her.

Before I walked into her office, we were just two bewildered people, fretting about the bad breaks we'd been having, uncertain of the future. After we met, we seemed to know where we were going. We fit into each other's lives, and know we were meant for one another.

IF I COULD LIVE OVER ONE DAY IN MY LIFE:

I'd choose my wedding day.

Susie and I slipped off to Tia Juana, Mexico, for the ceremony. It was a hot day, and I mean hot. We waited for an hour in a dusty, smothering little office for the man who married us. Then we waited again for things that had to be signed. There wasn't a good place to eat and the food was awful. Our hands were sticky and there was sand in our hair. But for the first time in my life I was ecstatically happy and it seemed too wonderful to be true.

I ENJOY:

Writing letters; music—any kind, including loud music; digging in my garden; cutting back hedges and shrubbery; changing things around. Susie says I enjoy change for its own sake.

We live in a house Susie bought when she was with Fox Studios. Ever since we've (Continued on page 65)

WEDDING OF THE MONTH

IT WAS all so romantic.

Young Kim Hunter, just twenty-one, was making stills with her friend, Ruth Hussey, for "Tender Comrade." A couple of Marine fliers wandered into the portrait gallery and watched the proceedings. They were both handsome boys, wearing battle ribbons and one of them, Captain Bill Baldwin, also wore the presidential citation for valor in action in the South Pacific.

The boys had been permitted into the studio because they already knew Ruth Hussey, and presently, Ruth was introducing Kim Hunter to Captain Baldwin, and right then and there, Cupid began fluttering his wings like crazy.

You see the result on this page: Kim, aged twenty-one, getting the wedding license with Bill, aged twenty-three. They were wed in the Church of the Blessed Sacrament in Beverly Hills just a week later and now they have a little house in the seaside town of Laguna Beach, some twenty odd miles from Hollywood. There Bill is trying to recover from the recurrent attacks of malaria that are keeping him out of action and there Kim is learning all the housewifely arts and loving them—and Bill.

Here is the amazing, heart warming story of what happens to returning stars when they deliver the messages our fighting men send back home

BY CONSTANCE PALMER

Una Merkel and Phyllis Brooks were with Gary Cooper on his tour of the South Pacific. The gals tried to dish out glamour as far as the rugged background would permit. And at least Brooksie could give out with bare legs.

Tell Mom You Saw Me

THE roar of the motors is louder, the gray bulk of the Army plane deadly and efficient as the ship touches the good American earth with the delicacy of a ballerina. The doors open.

A girl in flier's pants and too-big wind-breaker jumps down with a clatter of infantryman's shoes. The clothes are all borrowed and obviously weren't meant for a woman in the first place. Her face is dirty, her hair hangs in wisps, she is tired. Dog-tired.

But you don't notice the clothes or the dank hair because of the smile shining through the dirt on her lovely face.

Then another girl jumps out—a man with a concertina—another man whose civilian clothes hang loose from shoulders that sag with a great physical weariness.

And they're all smiling too, with a kind of proud happiness that sets them apart from you and me.

Though this plane came from the North, yesterday one landed here from across the Pacific. Last week another flew up to Miami from Brazil, shuttling across from North Africa.

And so they come back—the players who have been overseas bringing a little of home and America to our fighting men everywhere and who are bringing back messages, messages to loved ones waiting in surroundings empty and unseen.

"Tell Mom you saw me—"

Those are the words that cover everything. Just call Mom up or write her a letter and tell her that and she'll feel better about everything. She'll listen with all her heart to that voice coming across the miles of wire and be comforted to know that that same voice talked to her boy. She'll take the letter and smooth and caress and treasure it, because that same hand shook her boy's hand and now writes news of him to her.

The stars back from overseas have all delivered—and are still delivering—this simple message. But sometimes there are messages more particular and personal

Gary Cooper, in the South Pacific, had to recall, by request of Marines, the Gehrig farewell speech from "Pride of the Yankees"—but that was nothing to what he had to hand out when he got home.

Neil Hamilton takes time out for his Christmas dinner—the very same sort many of the boys had!

A little girl in pig-tails and a red gingham dress cried when Frances Langford handed her a champagne-cork with a note tied to it. Frances cried, too, standing there on the steps of a tiny honeymoon cottage in Van Nuys, a little town just out of Hollywood.

The little girl was so young she should have been going to high school, swooning over Sinatra, but she wasn't. She was a wife, waiting and hoping and lonely for her husband who was flying in Italy. He'd given Frances the cork one raw and rainy night in a dismal little inn in Palermo on the island of Sicily, when he and his squadron were celebrating their return from a successful mission over Naples.

And a mother and father in South Pasadena were happy with a pair of pants. It doesn't sound like much of a present, but they belonged to their son who was flying in Italy, too. He had given them to Frances one day in Messina when the wind was so strong it just wasn't possible to appear decently in skirts on the high wooden platform they'd built for her.

These are some of the little things that make the great effort easier to bear.

"The boys up there in Alaska have been gone such a long time—some of them 40 months," Martha O'Driscoll told me, "that they've become so shy they hardly know what to say."

The desolation of snow and ice, the monotony and the loneliness have blotted out for awhile their easy American friendliness.

"But one of the boys in Sitka did manage to ask me to send flowers—with his New Year's love—to his fiancee in Gainsville, Florida," Martha said. "Another in Attu wanted me to take a bouquet of flowers to Long Beach, to his baby he'd never seen.

"Still another just wanted me to call his girl in Riverside, California. He explained apologetically—as if such a little thing might be too much trouble for me—that it wouldn't be hard to reach her because she was the long-distance operator there!"

One rainy afternoon the phone rang in a little house in Pomona and a crisp Australian voice asked to speak to Don's mother.

"This is Errol Flynn. I've just seen your son in Alaska—"

Don's mother, when she could get her breath, at the sound of such a famous voice, poured a torrent of entreaty into Flynn's ear. Would Mr. Flynn, please, please come and have dinner with her—and talk about Don?

Mr. Flynn did, and stayed all evening, looking at baby pictures and school trophies and doing a great deal of listening.

But what touched him more than anything was the dinner: it was cooked—not for (Continued on page 71)

Bob Hope turning up at any base or hospital means fun for men. Bob's favorite hospital crack, "Did you see the show or were you already sick?" brought plenty of laughter from the men. (Right) Bob shakes hands with General Jimmy Doolittle while Frances Langford stands by.

GREER GARSON,

That is her proud title. It is also the secret of her present greatness—as this story proves

They resumed their war-interrupted honeymoon in Boston, Ensign Richard Ney and Greer Garson. They had a brief few days together in California, before Richard set sail.

NAVY WIFE

BY TERRY RUSSELL

Down these stairs walks one of Hollywood's most intelligent actresses. Her ideals are truly as great as those of the "great women" she's played.

Greer loves luxury and has earned it for herself. This is part of her exquisite drawing room. She did all the decorating herself, and with truly professional results.

THE very beautiful, very weary actress glanced, with tired anger, at the ringing telephone. The place was Montreal, Canada. The setting was one of those pleasant but excessively impersonal rooms characteristic of the best hotels. Even if the calendar had not recorded the November 7th date, the cold rain that beat ferociously against the window panes would have been sufficient winter warning.

The actress had finished her last day touring for a Canadian War Loan Drive. She was tired as you can only be when you have talked too much, and smiled too much, and shaken too many hands. Her natural friendliness made it impossible for her not to shout heartily in answer to any shouted greetings from the crowds that had lined the streets of her whole tour. Given a smile, no matter how goofy, she always had to attempt a reply. So now she was practically ill with fatigue, heartbreakingly homesick and lonely, and she had given specific orders that the phone was not to be rung.

But there the phone was, ringing madly, practically bounding off the bedside table in its shrill demand. She let it ring, thinking perhaps by ignoring it, she could silence it. She couldn't. It kept right on. Finally, she tore the receiver off the hook.

"I thought I gave orders . . ."

"Oh, Miss Garson," the phone girl interrupted. "It's your husband. It's Ensign Ney calling."

It was the first time Greer had heard her husband's eager voice since two days (Continued on page 69)

AS YOU read this, our country will have been at war approximately two years and five months. To no community in our great land, has the war wrought more changes than to Hollywood. To the fight for freedom, Hollywood has given not only its manpower and its money but its time, its talents, its dreams. The men are in uniform, but the girls have gone to battle in their own way, on bond tours in this country, over the air on Command Performance, out in the mud of the South Pacific, the fiery deserts of North Africa, the snows of Alaska on entertainment tours.

Movieland herewith honors the male stars in uniforms, not because they are braver than all the millions of lesser known men in uniform, nor because they have given up more glittering lives. Movieland honors them because we do not want you to forget them. It's because there's this about an actor: great as his talent may be, it cannot exist without a public to appreciate it. So here's to them, heroes all, and certainly the handsomest bunch of fighting men the world has ever seen.

There are also 38 Hollywood producers and executives who have gone into service. There are 132 directors, assistant directors and unit managers who have left the picture industry for military service. Some players have served in the armed services but are now released. These men are Freddie Bartholomew, George Brent, Lt. Hugh Enfield (Craig Reynolds), William Haines, and Alan Ladd.

Lt. Enfield, U.S.M.C. (Craig Reynolds) is the first Hollywood hero wounded in action, he having been in that heroic band who were in the first landing barge on Tulagi Island, a landing that was made on the same day and under the same fearful conditions as our landing on Guadalcanal.

BOWEN CHARLETON TUFTS III

HE'S SONNY TO HIS FRIENDS, KANSAS TO HIS FANS AND SOMETHING SWELL AT THE BOX-OFFICE

"I WILL not write a column on any grown-up man who goes around letting himself be called 'Sonny'!"

The newspaperman was positive, and to the point. Nevertheless, the Paramount publicist tried again.

"He's got another name—but it's, uh—a little heavy to lug around. Bowen Charleton Tufts III—son of Bowen Charleton Tufts II, the banker, you know."

"How ducky!" said the columnist.

"Aw'fly good background," persisted the publicist, "Boston Back Bay Society—and, and stuff——"

"That does it. I never learned to typewrite with my little finger lifted. Nope, no column."

Two weeks later the same newspaperman was back, to see the same publicist. He was wearing an everything-happens-to-me expression.

"Okay—I'm licked. My wife went to a preview of 'So Proudly We Hail' last night. She came home and woke me up out of a sound sleep—'I've just seen the most terrific guy!' she said. Well, you're married—you know a man can't fight forever. Lead me to your Sonny Tufts."

They walked across the lot to a sound stage where a picture called "I Love a Soldier" was shooting. Paulette Goddard was taking instructions for a scene from Director Mark Sandrich. With her was a big fellow wearing rumpled khaki, sandy hair, and a gentle, sort of perpetually puzzle faced. He was filling in his time with a kind of three-way operation—listening to the director, shifting his large feet, and using one of his big hands to give himself a half-hearted scalp-rub, all at the same time.

"Stand still," said Paulette, "you fidget around more than Shirley Temple!"

Sonny gave her one of his big, slow grins.

"If you had hands and feet the size of mine, what would you do with them?"

The newspaperman stared. "Why, he's a mug!" he said happily. The publicist nodded, also happily. A little later, the newsman spoke again. "He's even better than that—he's an intelligent mug!"

There may be a better anecdote with which to summarize the case of Sonny Tufts, social scion and screen sensation, but if there is we don't know it. Unless, maybe, we left out the "social" stuff altogether—the way Sonny does in real life. If there was ever a fellow born to be liked just for his own great, good-looking, good-humored self, this Tufts is the boy. Good birth and background are things that happen to people; simplicity and naturalness, humor and honesty, the immediately likeable qualities that made Sonny an instant hit on the screen, are things he achieved strictly on his own.

Closeup of the guy who went to Yale because all his family had always gone to Tufts or Harvard college. Sonny's like that, does things individually.

Sonny's no chip off the old block for he comes from a long line of banking forefathers. But here he is chipping the blocks for his outdoor fireplace.

The Tufts study blueprints for their after-the-war house which they plan to build. Barbara Tufts was a concert dancer until six years ago when she gave up that art for the more important art of being a wife.

Paramount's new pride and joy has been credited with the world's easiest crash into the cinemas. It has been told how he was led into the studio offices one morning by one Jack Donnelly, hotel man, who walked up to Joe Egli, casting executive, and pointed: "Meet my friend, Sonny Tufts," said Donnelly. "He wants to be in pictures." Mr. Egli, indicating that the feeling was mutual, pulled out a contract and they took turns writing their names on it.

It has also been told how Sonny's Hollywood trip and living expenses were financed by millionaire sportsman Alexis Thompson, in return for a percentage of the salary Mr. Thompson knew his six-foot-four friend was bound to get. And also, how Thompson, now in the Army, has sometimes gotten caught in a crap game without any of his millions handy in his pockets, and faded his opponents with Sonny's contract instead. (There's a rumor that the Tufts guy is putting in a little secret practice with the dice and when he gets good enough with the sevens and elevens, will challenge Alex and win himself back).

What with one story and another, it's got so the first thing a stranger says on being introduced to him is, "Gosh—are you lucky!" Sonny is practically noncombustible, or this remark would burn him. He doesn't believe in so-called "luck" as far as success is concerned.

"I hate to sound like a stuffed shirt," he says apologetically, "but there never was a career based on pure luck alone. The yarn about my quick contract is true—but with reservations. On behalf of the thousands of ambitious kids who are apt to sit around waiting for the same kind of miracle to happen to them, I'd like to explain it.

"The truth is, I made up my mind to be an actor when I was six years old, and spent some twenty years working up to it. When Mr. Egli asked me what qualifications I had for the entertainment business, I could tell him that I'd sung all my life—maybe not so good, but loud—and all the way from church choirs, to glee clubs, to night clubs and the Broadway stage. I had studied voice and dramatics, here and abroad—owned five college bands of my own—and had learned the difference between good and not-good movies by reviewing pictures on the Yale Record for a couple of years. I hadn't ever worked in front of a camera—but at least I wasn't going to be gun-shy when they yelled 'Shoot'!

"You see, there's always been a lot of fellows who looked at Taylor or Gable and thought, 'I'm as good looking as he is—I'm a cinch for the movies.' Now, they're going to look at me and (Continued on page 81)

Gloria Jean

Born April 14

GLORIA JEAN is a gifted child of Aries and should find 1944 a most amazing year. It is destined to bring someone into her life who will help her follow her most idealistic impulses and teach her to listen to her inner self.

Her natal Sun in Aries and her natal Moon in Virgo promise exceptionally good judgment and the desire to perfect herself in her profession. The Aries Sun trines her natal Neptune in Leo, providing will and inspiration to work hard and wait with a modicum of patience until her talents are developed to their fullest.

Hers is a naturally generous disposition with keen appreciation of music and drama, sharpened by a desire for absolute perfection in herself and others which should mellow into a tolerance for others. She has a humorous view of her own limitations as critic.

Saturn in Sagittarius and Uranus in Aries give mental vigor which can be somewhat outspoken, independent and disputative, combined with ambitions which must be wisely used to avoid future loneliness. Jupiter in Pisces brings help from others, and she is fast learning to control her restless Mars in Gemini. Her mind is quick and clever and she is at the same time ably guided by those who clearly see her potentialities.

An affectionate nature is the open road to her confidence, and she is capable of keen judgment and discrimination, shown by her cooperation with those who are her tutors and in whom she has a well founded faith. She must trust these, for they have had glimpses of the fire and beauty with which they are working. They are earnestly working for her future.

Her progressed Sun and Moon conjunct this year. This is sometimes a position where the Native is so close to herself that it is hard to see events or persons clearly and impartially. Patience is her keynote for 1944, and if educational matters in some ways seem too restricting, she must realize that she is preparing for a place being made ready for her. With poise and completed talents she may fully enjoy the responsibilities of great stardom.

She should grow up slowly, keeping her feet on the ground and showing generosity toward those who do not possess her talents or good fortune. Her career is assured by wholehearted cooperation during 1944, so she should forget and forgive whatever has seemed to hold her back in the past.

ARE THESE YOUR FAVORITE LOVE SCENES?

Fourteen Stars Chose These Seven Tender Moments—and Give The Most Revealing Reasons Why

THE Five Star Final: the champagne scene between (right) Bergman and Humphrey Bogart in "Casablanca" (Movieland's Own Favorite Love Scene, too, we assure you). Such highly different performers as Alan Ladd, Judy Garland, Helmut Dantine, Maureen O'Hara and Ginger Rogers all proclaim this the romantic masterpiece. Said Helmut Dantine: "The scene is outstanding for two reasons. Here is reality, rather than the usual sweetness and light. Then it's a mature love scene played by two mature people expressing mature emotions, with Bogart's manly Americanism and Bergman's Continentalism making a superb combination."

Said Ginger: "I prefer it for Ingrid Bergman. She is my favorite actress." Said Maureen O'Hara: "Because the words were logical and real, I regard it as the most beautifully written love scene ever screened, and Bogart and Bergman played it with such consummate art it seemed as real as it was written."

Little Judy Garland said almost what Maureen O'Hara said. Judy declared, "All the love scenes in 'Casablanca' were so authentic that I felt as though I were part of them myself. That is because of their wonderful simplicity."

But it remained for that romantic-threat man, Alan Ladd, who recently played "Casablanca" on the air, to give the best reasons of all. Murmured Laddie: "The emotions of strong people are the only ones that really thrill the world. The reason the love story of Rhett Butler and Scarlett O'Hara intrigued us all was because they were equally mated when it came to toughness. But in 'Casablanca' you had a man of physical toughness against a woman with the greatest spiritual strength.

"That made the love story both subtle and powerful, a wonderful combination. And exquisite as Bergman was, I say that Bogart's was the greater performance. As another screen tough guy, I know how difficult it is to sustain such a characterization as Bogie gave. In fact, until I saw him do 'Casablanca' I would have said it was impossible. But Bogie did it magnificently and flawlessly."

Well put, Alan—and so intelligently discriminating.

The three-star winner: Charles Boyer and Irene Dunne in the boat scene in "Love Affair". Such diverse personalities as Mario Montez, Paulette Goddard and Ida Lupino chose this one. Says Montez, "Ah, such haunting tenderness." Says Goddard, "There is no screen lover to compare with Boyer". Says Lupino, "I want to be the woman Boyer loves."

The two-star winner: Greta Garbo and Robert Taylor in "Camille". → Olivia de Havilland and Deanna Durbin go for this. Soys Deanna, very simply, "It's the most beautiful, most romantic and most effective love scene I ever saw." Remarks Olivia, more poeticolly, "It wasn't like seeing a movie at all. I felt as though it was actuolly happening and as though, in watching it, I was really trespassing."

Miss Colbert sides in with half the feminine population of the world in remembering Gable. This love scene in his final picture before enlistment, "Somewhere I'll Find You" with Lana Turner, makes Cloudette say: "Any love scene with Clork is my idea of the best love scene."

Miss Turner, however, who befare the war was Captain Gable's film tootsie pie, remembers Bob Taylor, particularly in this lave scene between him and Vivien Leigh in "Waterloo Bridge". "They were shown dancing together by candlelight—remember?" asks Lana. "I think that was the most romantic, charming and different love scene I ever saw."

By way of getting a really he-man opinion on love scenes, we sought aur cowboy hero Roy Rogers. By cracky, he did have a fovorite. "The scene between Henry Fonda and Ginger Rogers in 'Tales of Manhattan'," said Roy. "I go for it because it's the romance of a shy boy. I used to be shy and Henry Fonda reminded me so much of myself."

Lastly, a note of tragedy—tragedy inspired by the bright memory of the lost, lovely girl who played this scene. The choice is Barbora Stanwyck's. "My favorite love scene is this one from 'Honds Across the Table'," says Stanny. "We always thought of Carole Lombard as a great comedienne, and she certainly was. Yet, with all thot gift of comedy knaw-how, she cauld put across a love scene superlatively."

THE LITTLE WOMAN starring HEDY LAMARR

BY FREDDA DUDLEY

MRS. JOHN LODER, also known widely as Hedy Lamarr, was reading the evening paper. "Here it is," she said to her husband, indicating a bit of fine print with her fingertip. "The Gorilla Man is playing at our neighborhood theatre."

John unclenched his perennial pipe. "For goodness sake," he begged. "You wouldn't enjoy it, and I'd be embarrassed by having you see such a thing."

"I've heard several people say that for a B picture, it's excellent and that you are well photographed. Come on, John," said the little woman.

So the Loders, despite continued protests from the taller half of the family, went to see The Gorilla Man. Afterward Hedy observed with great decision, "I knew it! You're good even in a bad picture. Now you must insist on better pictures. If your studio hasn't a picture ready for you, you should ask them to let you go."

John, the easy-going type, demurred. He was inclined to view the delay in casting with philosophical calm.

"They'll have something for me soon," he prophesied. "After all, Old Acquaintance hasn't been released yet and I feel certain that it will do me some good."

Hedy, combining reason with her strong conviction of John's talent, agreed to be patient a bit. When Old Acquaintance was released, John went to the Brothers Warner and asked what they had lined up for him next. He said he was tired of loafing (Continued on page 87)

Hedy and John met at the Hollywood Canteen on Christmas Eve, 1942. It was love at first sight and a date that began that evening has lasted up to and including the minute you are reading these lines. Being so indebted to the Canteen, they appear there each Friday in celebration. Washing dishes is quite in order, but the other activities, here recorded, are extra-curricular—but soooo pleasant.

HERS IS THE FACE . . . that launched a million sighs of envy from other less fortunate women. She looks mysterious and sirenic. Actually, Hedy Lamarr really likes the simplest existence: a little house, her handsome husband and her adopted son.

THE PURPLE HEART

(20th Century-Fox)

TWENTIETH CENTURY-FOX has stolen a march on the rest of Hollywood with a smashing war drama called "The Purple Heart." It was produced behind locked doors, and the cast sworn to secrecy about the plot, which was generally assumed to concern the proud history of a military award for "valor beyond the call of duty." To the surprise of most of the other studios came the revelation that Twentieth had made a story telling of the shocking trial of eight flyers who were captured and beheaded by the Japanese following the bombing of Tokyo.

"The Purple Heart" was completed in January, just a few days after the release of authenticated accounts of cruel, inhuman and uncivilized treatment of prisoners in Japan, atrocities which shook the whole world with anger. Coincident with the news came official orders to rush "The Purple Heart" into the nation's motion picture theatres. The United States government wanted to use every medium to acquaint the public with the real nature of its enemies in Japan.

The feeling you will take home with you after seeing it, and see it you must, is one of respect and honor for eight average Americans who withstood horrible tortures, and faced death, rather than betray their country. Their strength is so much greater than the enemy's that you won't let them down either, and that's the way these stout-hearted heroes are enacted by Dana Andrews, Farley Granger, John Craven, Sam Levene, Richard Conte, Kelvin O'Shea, Donald Barry and Charles Russell.

PASSPORT to MARSEIL

(Warner Bros.)

"PASSPORT to Marseille" is played by the majority of the adventurous cast that you met in "Casablanca," but don't mistake this trip for a sequel to the earlier yarn. It opens with the visit of a reporter to the camouflaged flying field of the Free French in England. Inquiry about the men who are even then off on a bombing mission causes a talkative captain to reveal his experiences with five of them. So the story flashes back to the time these five men were picked up in an open boat at sea, then again flashes back to the scene from which they came. All were convicts on Devil's Island who escaped to try to join the Free French in fighting for their country. They have to deal with some traitors on the freighter that rescues them, and there's action every minute.

With Humphrey Bogart, Philip Dorn, Peter Lorre, Helmut Dantine and George Tobias playing the five convicts, you should be able to draw a fair idea of the kind of hard-bitten portrayals that abound in the drama. No less expert is the playing of Claude Rains as the teller of this story to John Loder. Then there are Sidney Greenstreet and Victor Francen, as officials on the freighter, and Vladimir Sokoloff, unforgettable as the old convict who engineers the escape. A quite unnecessary note of a love story is added by Michele Morgan, as the wife who waits in vain for Bogart's return.

Nordhoff and Hall of "Mutiny on the Bounty" fame are the authors of the original novel which has been given a big-scale production by Warners. You will want to see it if you can take your adventure undiluted.

PHANTOM LADY

(Universal)

YOU, yourself, doubtless have used the expression, "I can't tell to save my life." Well, neither can a young architect charged with the murder of his wife. He has an alibi that no one will believe because substantiation of it cannot be found.

He tells of having spent the evening with a strange woman he met at a bar, and of having taken her to a theatre where she caused a disturbance because her hat was an exact duplicate of one worn by an actress on the stage. He never learned this "phantom lady's" name, nor can the police find witnesses who will admit seeing the architect, the lady or the strange hat. And the victim of circumstantial evidence literally can't tell more to save his life. It remains for the pretty secretary who is in love with him to untangle matters by interviewing a bartender, a taxi driver, actress, drummer and the phantom lady. The murderer has to be tricked into making a confession.

Joan Harrison, a woman producer new to Hollywood, brought this absorbing surprise mystery hit to the screen. She is a former associate of Alfred Hitchcock, a recognized master of suspense, and she has given much to this thrill-packed story. The three central roles are excellently performed by Franchot Tone, Ella Raines and Alan Curtis, and every minor characterization is an outstanding work. Take the drummer played by Elisha Cook, Jr. He is the swing-mad kid who escorts us to a basement jive session unequalled by any such scene in memory. Don't miss "Phantom Lady."

"SEE HERE, PRIVATE HARGROVE"

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

FIRST highly enjoyable comedy of rookie life in the training camps of World War II, "See Here, Private Hargrove" will be relished both by the service men and the families they left behind. At least such was the reception of the best-selling book about his misadventures as a draftee, by Marion Hargrove. And the very funny picture based upon it aptly catches the same spirit.

As the blundering Private Hargrove, the performance of Robert Walker is a joy. You will remember him as the unattached sailor who stole the show in "Bataan." Yet he has to divide honors in this with Keenan Wynn, the fellow who did that grand gangster in "Lost Angel." Here, the accomplished son of comedian Ed Wynn, plays a G.I. promoter whose money-making schemes complicate things for Hargrove. The boy, however, has a genius for trouble that needs no help—and regardless of his best intentions, he almost always ends up by polishing garbage pails on K. P.

The fun in "See Here, Private Hargrove" stems from the natural circumstances which plague all draftees in training. Perhaps the only movie "touch" is the casting of such a looker as Donna Reed in the role of the canteen worker with whom Hargrove falls in love. Robert Benchley has a delightful bit as the girl's talkative father who monopolizes the conversation with recollections of World War I. As sergeants, Chill Wills and Donald Curtis enforce military regulations to the discomfort of the rookies. It is an army of regular guys who can laugh about their discomforts and invite you to do likewise.

IT HAPPENED TOMORROW

(United Artists)

"IT HAPPENED TOMORROW" is a gorgeously imaginative farce having to do with hilarious impossibilities. For three days in succession, a young newspaperman finds himself in possession of copies of tomorrow's papers. At first, he can hardly credit his good luck in reading of a robbery hours before it happens. But on the second day, he capitalizes upon his preknowledge of the news to double his salary as the paper's ace reporter with a by-line.

Despite the jams he gets into with the police, he plans his marriage to a girl who has been working as a medium with her uncle in a theatrical clairvoyant act. On the third day he decides to clean up at the race track with sure bets on the winners. In looking up the results, he reads his own obituary on page one. How he avoids his fate brings fantastic events to a riotous close.

Had the makers of "It Happened Tomorrow" been given the power of reading reviews of their picture in advance, it would not have been quite so antic. It is set in the 1890s, and the cops are right out of the Keystone Comedy School. The period is not excuse enough for the attention given to the unfunny scene of the girl sneaking home in male attire. While the film could have been improved with more imagination, it is more amusing than most.

Dick Powell is at his easy best as the newspaperman, and Linda Darnell is a very lovely heroine. Jack Oakie plays the mind-reading faker for a solid laugh-getter, particularly at the races. And the character of little old Pop Benson is delightfully performed by John Philliber, under Rene Clair's direction.

HOW TO SNARE YOURSELF

Seven girls to one man, after the war! So warns Reader's Digest. Here's how four of Hollywood's youngest stars plan to get a man of their own

"I SUPPOSE I should be worrying about that," commented Susanna Foster, lilting along a Universal City street, "but I'm a fatalist. I'm convinced Fate will see that I get my man, when the time comes.

"As long as I can remember, I've had the dream that someday I'd meet and fall in love with the One Man, that everything in my life would lead up to that day, that we'd marry and live happily ever after. Now that I'm eighteen, I know life isn't like that, but still I can't give up the illusion. No matter how much I say to myself, 'I know it isn't so!', somehow I can't help believing it can happen that way."

Susanna has grown slim and tall—too tall, she thinks. "It's a handicap. Men are getting shorter as girls get taller, and there's nothing I hate worse than a tall girl with a little man," she says.

She believes that every girl should be honest with herself, first of all. People used to fool themselves,

Gail Russell (Paramount) worries not at all, for a very personal reason. She has quite definite ideas where marriage is concerned.

Susanna Foster (Universal) admits that she has a bad temper, also that she's temperamental—and if she falls in love he'll have to be very special.

BY ALICE L. TILDESLEY

A HUSBAND

and where did that get them? Pretty silly, wasn't it?

"Now take me—" and who wouldn't?—"I could never fall in love with a poor man. That is. I couldn't go for one who couldn't make his way in the world, because to me, much of the charm of a man is his ability to succeed in his own line. He needn't make as much money as I do, for I realize that this business is fantastic—but the man for me must be a success. Of course if, after we were married, he ran into bad luck—or a world-wide depression, as my father did when Insull crashed—I'd stick by him, because I know that a man who had it in him to succeed once could do it again."

After Susanna's father came upon hard times, his daughter knew at first-hand what poverty was, and being poor holds no glamour for her.

"It's one thing to have lived through years when all you could look forward to was buying a new pair of shoes once in six months, and (Continued on page 75)

Gloria de Haven (MGM) is the most idealistic and thinks she'd make a good wife for a poor man, if she loved him—for love would be most important.

Diana Lynn (Paramount) has her own opinion on the male subject. Being very romantic, she's sure her man will come along someday.

A HUSSEY IN LOVE

Critics are raving about the "new Ruth Hussey" in "Tender Comrade," "The Uninvited," and "Marine Raiders." If you, too, have wondered about the change in her—well, it's the nicest reason in the world

BY KATHERINE LAKE

"I'M GOING to have a baby!" And by that simple little announcement Ruth Hussey has played havoc with the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production schedule. She is cast for a new role, and makes a leave of absence request which can't very well be refused.

That Ruth is very delighted about the whole thing—that goes without saying. But it's plain, too, that having had her loaned out to other studios for the last year—making "The Uninvited" for Paramount and "Tender Comrade" for RKO—Metro had plans for Ruth's returning to her home lot. Fact is, they had called her about an assignment to appear in "Mrs. Parkington."

It was then came the news, "Sorry, I can't." And you know the reason!

Oh, she'd love to be back on the home lot again. She's sorry to hand MGM this new headache, after their having had to go through the same thing with Lana Turner, and just now getting Lana back from motherhood and safe in front of the cameras. "But really," Ruth murmurs sweetly, "how can I worry about anything—when I'm so very, very happy?"

She's happy—and, too, she's very much in love. You may not know it, but Ruth Hussey's is perhaps one of the most romantic love stories yet to come out of Hollywood. It happened like this:

He was a tall, deeply interested young man, and he exclaimed quietly about the beauty of Santa Paula mission—one of the most historic—established on the inland road that lies between Oceanside and Los Angeles, on Fra Junipero Serra's El Camino Real. This smallest of missions is situated within the confines of an Indian reservation, and is in its miniature way very beautiful.

This particular tourist was newly arrived from the east, on that particular day several years ago, and he was enchanted by the lace-like pepper trees, the pineapple-like palm trees and the adobe walls like nothing on earth except adobe. He told the lay brother who was explaining the history and current life of the mission, "I should like to be married here."

The lay brother said there was only one requirement for such a ceremony: a bride. (Continued on page 84)

Ruth frequently goes on army camp entertaining trips. Also, she lends a helping hand at the various officers' clubs. Joking with her here are Major Jack Hussey (he's no relation) and Major Zwick.

The Lt. Robert Longeneckers attend a symphonic concert. That's how it is—they like the same books, the same music, even the same people. And now they have "Junior" coming.

Beautiful, and instinctively dramatic, Ruth Hussey's the girl from New England—considered very much the type.

Movieland is proud of having Bonita as its guide to young people's problems because she is honest and fearless as you'll note when you read her answers.

YOUR PROBLEM

BY Bonita Granville

BREAD WINNER

Dear Bonita:

I am working and earning twenty-five dollars a week. My father makes me give him my check each week and then gives me enough for carfare and lunches.

I live with my mother and father and two sisters. They have the same problem. We want our money. We are willing to pay our share of the family expenses, but we hate to have to go to Dad everytime we want to buy a hat or go to a movie. This is the twentieth century and he treats us like the gay nineties.

We all want to leave home and take an apartment. Between us we earn enough to do this, but we hate to leave our mother. Besides even if he is strict, we love our father. What do you think we should do?

HELEN

- Dear Helen:

I think you should stay at home. No matter what the conditions are, girls are better off at home if they can stay there. You didn't mention your ages. Even if you are legally of age, you should discuss your problem with your father. You should show him that you are capable of taking care of your money and you should have the experience of doing so.

You three girls should sit down and figure out what is proper out of your salaries to be given back into the household as board. You should discuss this thoroughly with your father and mother and try to get them to see that it is right.

Your father is probably trying to help you save your money, but I agree with you that he has taken the wrong way of doing it. Try to make him understand that you all want to assume responsibility for your share in the house, but you also want the experience of handling your own money. Ask him if you couldn't try it for six months under his guidance and supervision. I hope this helps you with your problem.

Sincerely,
BG

OBSERVANT LADY

Dear Bonita:

I notice that your fingernails are very short in pictures and wonder if you have the same trouble I do about them breaking. I saw you in "Andy Hardy's Blonde Trouble" and they seemed to be a bit longer. How did you do it? My nails split and crack around the edges. It's no wonder. I cook and clean house, and take care of my two-year-old baby. It occurred to me that you might have some new trick in caring for your nails, that would help me.

I drink lots of milk and eat leafy vegetables. Do you have some new Hollywood trick or do you wear false fingernails in pictures?

ELAINE

- Dear Elaine:

You are a very observant young lady. My nails were short. I kept them that way deliberately. They kept breaking off on the corners and it was very distressing. Following diet advice from my physician and common sense on my own part I finally licked my trouble.

I kept the nails short, did them myself and kept all the rough edges filed off. I soaked my nails in warm oil every night and massaged the cuticles. They are beginning right now to look like something, but it took a full year.

Why don't you consult your physician, perhaps you have some deficiency? If not, perhaps more care of your nails and hands, personally, might do the trick.

Sincerely,
BG

MARRIAGE NOW?

Dear Miss Granville:

I am nineteen and very much in love with a soldier who is about to go overseas. I have known him six months and we love each other very deeply. My parents are very fond of him and I met his parents when they came to visit him a few months ago. In fact, my mother had them for lunch one day. We were both raised in the same type of home and have had equal schooling and advantages. I work in a dental office and can support myself after he goes. My parents want me to wait but we both want to get married immediately. Why can't we grab at a little happiness while we can? What would you do in my case?

JANE

- Dear Jane:

You may not like my advice, but you asked for it. I think you should wait until after the war to marry. Hasty war marriages are many and it is rare when they turn out happily.

If you are sincere in your love for each other you should be strong enough to wait. Strong enough to send him off knowing that you love him and will wait for him. Strong enough to go on with your job with a happy heart, planning your future life together. A few short weeks together is not a basis for a happy marriage.

Separation does strange things to people. Neither of you know how you will feel about each other after this is over. Right now you think your love is deathless but so much can happen to change both of you. You owe it to yourself and to him and perhaps to your future children to wait until times call for all that makes for happy marriages.

Go on with your plans. Write to him daily, if you possibly can. In your letters plan your future. Let him know that you are true to him, that you love him and that you will be there when he comes back. Get to know his parents better, invest your money in war bonds for the future. Both of you working together in this way can guarantee the future that you have dreamed of.

My every good wish for your happiness,

BG

AND MINE

Herewith are the first letters answered by Bonita Granville which we promised you last month.. Do you have personal problems that you feel only youth can solve?. If you do, let Bonita Granville be your counsellor. Address Bonita Granville, in care of Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset, Los Angeles 46, California, and try to keep letters down to two hundred words. Watch for her replies such as the ones we print in this issue. You can see that Bonita is serious and wise for her years, and because she considers herself just another of the "younger generation" she may be able to help you with your problems.

FRECKLES ARE FUN

Dear Bonita:

I saw you in your picture "Hitler's Children" and could see that you have very nice skin. I am nineteen and am red-headed. My skin is freckled and it bothers me. I have tried everything I could to help the freckles and I envy girls with clear skins. Did you ever have freckles and what did you do about them? What do your friends on the screen do to not show them.

SYBIL

● Dear Sybil:

I am afraid you are stuck with your freckles. But now is the time you should realize that they can be made an asset to your personality rather than a hindrance. Many movie stars have freckles and love them. Joan Crawford, Myrna Loy and Jeanette Macdonald are all Freckle faces. When they are not in front of the cameras they don't wear makeup. They proudly display their freckles and look very cute. Girls I know with freckles wear makeup in the evening. They use a light powder base and matching powder. Why don't you try this evenings? However, it would be silly to try to hide the fact that you have freckles. Why don't you try to wear colors that might tone them down a bit? In other words, avoid any reds, brown, orange, and try green, blue, and black. It is worth a try. By the way, I am slightly freckled and love it.

Sincerely,
BG

TO DATE OR NOT TO DATE

Dear Miss Granville:

My fiance has been overseas for the past year. I love him very much and we plan to marry when he returns. I am in great trouble with my family and friends. I went out with a boy, an old friend of my sweetheart's and myself, and now everyone thinks I am being untrue to my fiance. This is not the case. I love him more now than ever before, but I don't see any harm in going out with friends.

What is a girl supposed to do, go into hiding? I told my mother that she was almost forcing me into sneaking out once in a while, which I don't want to do. I think girls need the companionship of boys once in a while and can do it without being untrue to their sweethearts, don't you?

ELEANOR

● Dear Eleanor:

I agree with you thoroughly. I think you should have the companionship of young men even if your fiance is overseas. However, I think I agree with your family and friends that you shouldn't be seen out too much with any one man. Why not compromise? Why don't you plan little parties in your own home and invite your friends in? Why don't you, whenever you do go out, make sure that you are in the company of other people?

It is true that your fiance doesn't have the opportunity to go out with girls where he is, but if you have his permission (which you neglected to mention in your letter), then I see no harm in your having men friends.

One thing you should make sure, even if you have the permission of your fiance, is that he wouldn't misunderstand your motive. Make sure that he hears about your activities from yourself, rather than from scandal-mongering friends. Then confine all of your activities to groups and refuse the lone dates that people might misunderstand and might lead you into unhappy situations.

Sincerely,
BG

On page 52 you'll see a bevy of Hollywood daughters and mothers, but no pair are more understanding friends than our girl-adviser Bonita and her pretty mama shown here.

am. I may leave the house at five for a dinner date, but it's quarter to nine when I arrive. I can't figure out what happens.

I'LL NEVER FORGET:

A dress my mother had that I adored. It was royal blue with a white top and a sash of cherry red, beautifully soft and bright. She had royal blue kid pumps to go with it, and when she was at work I used to put on the dress and stump around in the slippers, clop, clop, clop along the hall.

I CAN'T COOK:

My coffee is so bad even I won't drink it. I can scramble eggs, and I'm the best toast-maker in the family; but my kitchen accomplishments end there.

TURNING POINTS IN MY LIFE:

That day I went to the soda fountain opposite Hollywood High School, when the talent scout saw me and I was chosen to play the victim in "They Won't Forget." Suppose I hadn't gone there that day. Where would I be now? What would I be doing? Would I ever have met Steve?

Having my baby. She has entirely changed my life. And I adore that fact.

I AM MAD ABOUT:

My baby. She wakes up smiling, she never cries, she does the things babies should do, cheerfully. She's beautiful, adorable, perfect. And I don't think I'm just being maternal when I say so!

THE FIRST THING THAT ATTRACTS ME:

Is a person's mouth. I find it fascinating to watch a lovely mouth, see how it shapes words, how it curves into a smile.

MY FAVORITE SONG:

Is "Embraceable You."

MY FAVORITE PICTURE:

Of all my pictures is "Ziegfeld Girl." I worked hardest in that picture; I had the best time making it; I liked it best. Director Robert C. Leonard directed "Ziegfeld Girl." He's directing my new picture, "Marriage is a Private Affair," so I'm happy about that, too.

SOME DAY:

I'd like to travel in Europe. But not until the world has recovered from war and scars have had a chance to heal.

I HOPE:

I'll be a good mother, first of all. I'll be a good actress. I admire Bette Davis. I'd love to do her type of character work, but I'd prefer my parts not quite so brittle and hard.

I NEVER:

Turn back to look at the past. What is over is over and I forget it. I'll admit I like to peep into the future, and hope and plan for good things to come, but—

I LIVE

Now!

What happens when your hat comes down?

SOMEDAY the War will be over.

Hats will be tossed into the air all over America on that day.

But what about the day after?

No man knows just what's going to happen then. But we know one thing that must not happen:

We must not have a postwar America fumbling to restore an out-of-gear economy, staggering under a burden of idle factories and idle men, wracked with internal dissension and stricken with poverty and want.

That is why we must buy War Bonds —now.

For every time you buy a Bond, you not only help finance the War. You help to build up a vast reserve of postwar buying power. Buying power that can mean millions of postwar jobs making billions of dollars' worth of postwar goods and a healthy, prosperous, strong America in which there'll be a richer, happier living for every one of us.

To protect your Country, your family, and your job after the War—buy War Bonds now!

been married we've wanted to buy a new home, but first we couldn't find what we liked and now we realize that this isn't the time to buy. I tinkered around, trying to remodel the place, but Susie thought it was too bad to sink more money into a house we didn't intend to keep. She suggested that we sell every stick of furniture we had and with the money refurnish the entire place. We got a good price for our period furniture and had the time of our lives finding exactly the right pieces, drapes and whatnot. There was enough money from our sale to do some remodeling, too.

IN THE FUTURE:

Say, twenty years ahead, I'd like to direct pictures. But not until I know my present job of acting inside out.

I ADORE:

My nine months' old daughter, Alana.

MY BIGGEST THRILLS WERE:

When Bette Davis selected me over all other candidates to play opposite her in a Silver Theater radio show. Working for the first time on a Lux radio program under the direction of C. B. DeMille in "Return of Peter Grimm."

Getting the small role in "Captain Cautious" at the Hal Roach Studios.

Being chosen for big parts in "Joan of Paris" at RKO and "This Gun for Hire" at Paramount on the very same day, each studio offering me a contract. Susie and I were in seventh heaven that day, after the years of plugging away trying to sell me for parts that went to other actors.

And the day, after I joined the Army, when I finally got my uniform. It didn't fit, and I stood in the rain in line with all the others who had just received their uniforms, all of us looking alike, all of us bursting with pride. I'll never forget it.

I LEARNED IN THE ARMY:

That none of us ever quite grow up. It was like going back to school, with all of us rooting for our own outfits; all of us looking forward to the end of the war as we'd look forward to the end of school; that being thrown together in camp brings about a companionship between men different from anything in civilian life.

How lucky, how very lucky, I was to have had Susie.

I BELIEVE:

In Fate.

I'm sure there's a definite reason for everything that happens, and that things will work out as they are meant to do.

At least, I'm very sure when Susie is around. She has such firm faith in the rightness of the universe that if I get off the track and go back to worrying, one look at Susie can jerk me back in line.

I KNOW:

Nothing is certain but change.

But I can wish, can't I?

To People who want to write

but can't get started

Do you have that constant urge to write but the fear that a beginner hasn't a chance? Then listen to what the editor of Liberty, said on this subject:

> "There is more room for newcomers in the writing field today than ever before. Some of the greatest of writing men and women have passed from the scene in recent years. Who will take their places? Who will be the new Robert W. Chambers, Edgar Wallace, Rudyard Kipling, and many others whose work we have published? It is also true that more people are trying to write than ever before, but talent is still rare and the writer still must learn his craft, as few of the newcomers nowadays seem willing to do. Fame, riches and the happiness of achievement await the new men and women of power."

MOTHER OF 4 EARNS $1,000 ON HER WRITING

"Without jeopardizing our home life a bit, I have been able to earn $1,000 since graduating from N.I.A. If I had not the responsibility of four small children, home duties, haphazard health and war work, I am sure I could have made much more. After only two lessons, I sold a garden series to Baltimore American. The N.I.A. way makes writing child's play."
—Gladys Carr, Annapolis, Md.

terers turned the heat on Virginia Bruce. Clark did see Virginia on a few occasions. Next they had the Captain practically married to the blonde Kay Williams, who is on the M-G-M payroll. Clark dated her, too, but not seriously. Now it's Betty.

Myself, I think with Clark it's just a memory, the memory of beautiful Carole. But Betty is more like Carole than any other movie girl about town. She isn't as beautiful, but Betty has Carole's brand of intense vitality, her wonderful quality of frankness and honesty, her vivid sense of fun. Those are all qualities that Clark likes.

TALK OF THE TOWN

People around town are still hoping that the Bob Walkers may get together again. Their close friends insist that Bob is one of those grown-up babies, not quite knowing what he wants from life and that exquisite Jennifer Jones got tired of having to be the person to shoulder all responsibilities always.

But of all the separated people who will not come together again, the John Waynes lead the list. It's a sad shame.

They were boy and girl sweethearts, those two. They went together for years before their marriage. They have four fine children.

When they came to parting, their friends were most unhappy for charming Josephine Wayne. Now, however, they feel sorry for John, also. For John wants to return home again, but Jo will have no part of it. "I'm sorry," she says, "but it is just over."

John is steadily dating Esperanza Bauer, a pretty thing he met south of the border, meanwhile.

SHE GOES FOR WRITERS

Also you want to watch those John Gunther-Miriam Hopkins meetings. Mr. Gunther is the author of all the "Inside" books, "Inside Europe," "Inside Asia" and such. Miriam always has gone for writers. Austin Parker, her ex-husband, belonged to that gentry.

On the other hand, don't take those Veronica Lake-Jean Negulesco rumors too seriously. There are a couple of other gentlemen in the Lake picture, besides Director Jean who has romanced as many girls as that other director, Anatole Litvak, now a Colonel.

Mitch Leisen, director of "Lady In the Dark" with that charmer Claudette Colbert, effervescent Judy Garland and Billy Daniels

SPEAKING OF ANNIE

What does a fella give his girl? We can tell you that press agent beau Steve Hannagan gave his girl Annie Sheridan twelve hats.

It seems that Mr. Hannagan had ideas about ladies' hats, which didn't coincide with Miss Sheridan's ideas. Finally she told him that if he was so smart to go and get her some hats, but she wouldn't guarantee to wear them. However, she is wearing the twelve and adores each and every one.

Can this be love?

Speaking of Annie, her enthusiasm for all things Mexican has grown to include even jam sessions. The Sheridan is a swing fan of no mean proportions and jam sessions are a regular event at her home for Annie and her small crowd of chums. But now she makes it all south-of-the border. She particularly likes to have Carmen Miranda come and bring her own band, and the music starts at nine and keeps on long past the dawn's early light.

GUARANTEED CHIC

You don't realize what kids a lot of stars are until you hear stories like this.

When Ann Miller and Linda Darnell had been in Hollywood only a short time, they got their first invitation to the Mocambo. It was to be a double date, and as the Mocambo is the smoothest of Hollywood night clubs, both girls went into a twitch as to what they would wear. They got the dresses, coats and accessories settled, but the question of hats stumped them.

Their hairdresser told them it would be silly to pay a lot of money for new hats. She suggested that they buy artificial flowers and offered to pin them in their hair, guaranteeing an effect of chic.

The next day, the kids arrived at the beauty parlor armed with great gobs of flowers and feathers, and after the job was done, decided in great glee that they looked devastating.

But they had all day before their dates, with the result that they not only spent the remaining hours moving exclusively from the shoulders down, but had to peel off their clothes, take their baths and dress again without disturbing one forget-me-not on their respective noggins.

NO MEN ALLOWED

Elyse Knox has a club that is an echo of many suburban communities. Laundry is a wartime problem in movieland as in every large city. Elyse discovered that Mrs. Noah Beery Jr. had no convenient way to wash her babies' clothes. Then rooting around she found that Ann Gwynn and new bride Martha O'Driscoll also had the washing problem. And there Elyse was with a perfectly good washing machine in her house.

So now the girls all congregate at Elyse's home one day a week and do their washing. It's an all day affair with each girl bringing her lunch and sewing. While they wash and iron they help each other with manicures, hairdressing and sewing. Each girl puts in a dollar, which is donated to Red Cross. The day of maids is over and these little women are applying themselves strenuously to meet the current problems. Men are not allowed and the girls have a great gab fest.

NEWS ABOUT
MARIA MONTEZ
CHARLES BOYER
INGRID BERGMAN
BOB HOPE
GAIL PATRICK
K. T. STEVENS

WAITING FOR THE MAIL

Oddly enough, the last girl you would expect to be the most love-sick war bride in town is the very one who is. None other than Maria Montez haunts the letter box waiting for news from her Pierre Aumont.

EVERYBODY LAUGHED

And speaking of the unexpected, never did I expect to hear that the vast dignity of Mr. Charles Boyer had been upset by that Swedish goddess, Ingrid Bergman.

But thus it is.

To say that Mr. Boyer took himself seriously on the set of "Gaslight" is treating it most politely. He threw more temperament than Pola Negri ever did in her hey-day, and she set an all-time Hollywood high for didoes.

Came the day, however, when M. Charles had to do a scene where he had to bend and expose that spot where Mother used to apply the hairbrush. Things went wrong, so that the scene had to be made four different times.

Three times Ingrid resisted that impulse. The fourth time she did not. She kicked her co-star and hard.

Everybody laughed, very loudly.

Life was much easier on the "Gaslight" set after that.

A CAREER TO REMEMBER

Years ago, a gentleman named Ralph Staub took some pictures of the late Carole Lombard. Through these pictures Carole always said she got her opportunity to work in the Mack Sennett comedies that started her on her career. Ever after that Miss Lombard took pictures with Mr. Staub at least once a year. Now Staub is producer of Screen Snapshots and is getting together all of the pictures for a memorial reel on Carole. Even at the height of her fame Carole always took one day a year to do these pictures and thus there is a full length short subject of her career. You will be seeing it soon in your theaters.

UNANSWERED QUESTION

Gail Patrick is wearing a diamond ring on the third finger, left hand, which brings speculations as to whether it's an engagement ring from Freeman Gosden (Amos of "Amos and Andy"), but she won't say "yes" and she won't say "no."

NICE NOISES FROM NICE PEOPLE

K. T. Stevens and her director father Sam Wood just beam when they look at each other. I was stumbling over the electric wiring on the Columbia set of "Address Unknown," where K. T. is the feminine lead. Papa, daughter and I were having conversation. "Dad's the wizard in our family," piped Miss Stevens. And Mr. Wood, with that mellow twinkle in his eye, quipped, "I'm not ashamed of my dotter." Well, you expect nice noises like that between nice people, but there was something so homey and companionable about them that I just patted them both on the head and went smilingly on my way.

NEW ONE VIA HOPE

The whole world is aware of how truly brave and generous that greatest of guys, Bob Hope, is. But you can't make Bob make a hero of himself. For instance, when asked about his trip to Sicily, Bob said, "We crossed by plane. All the way across the Atlantic to England, we followed a path left by Churchill's cigar ashes. He crosses so often I wonder if he isn't delivering Eleanor Roosevelt's laundry."

GREER GARSON—NAVY WIFE

after their marriage on July 24, 1943. A star, a beauty, an intellectual, love had made her just one of the hundreds of thousands of Navy wives, living for letters, knowing weeks when not a message got through, followed by some ecstatic morning when the mail would be stacked high on her breakfast tray. Like other Navy wives, she only knew from his Fleet Post Office address on which ocean he was sailing. But whether he was in battle, whether he was well or ill, she could only guess.

Now she said, "Oh, Richard! Oh, darling, where are you?"

He was, it seemed, in Boston, his ship undergoing some sort of check-up.

"But how did you find me here?"

He had called California first, discovered she was on tour, and then called the Canadian Victory Drive headquarters, who had given him the name of her hotel.

"We're in port in Boston for a few days," he said. "Then we go to New York, where I get a short leave. Oh, darling, can you join me?"

Of course, Greer was in Boston the next morning. She and Richard went on to New York together. They had ten enchanted days there, touring the city, peering into shops, seeing the plays, eating in the fabulous restaurants. They ignored the diminishing days on the calendar, until the best news of all came to them. Ensign Ney had been transferred to another ship, one that would sail from San Pedro, California. This meant that they could journey to the Coast together, and that Richard could have a day or so at home on the beautiful estate that Greer had purchased only a few months before she had finally decided to marry.

Greer told me this story as we sat together in the drawing room of that house. Having known her since the early days of her career in Hollywood, I saw that this story, this love, was responsible for the change now so marked in her. It is responsible, too, I do believe, for her becoming first lady of the screen in so short a time. It will be responsible, also, I think, for keeping Greer in that coveted spot for a long time. But one cannot merely make a statement like that. It has to be proven. So listen.

"Richard and I got home," Greer explained, "to find my mother in the hospital, the servants gone, the ration points hopelessly scrambled. The latter two were easily straightened out. I was lucky enough to find a nice couple to run the house. I was reassured about my mother, who now blessedly is completely recovered. But what really hit me low was the news that my uncle, who has been my guardian ever since my father died, years ago, had died in active service. He was a doctor on duty in the Navy. And my youngest cousin, the baby of our whole family, who is just twenty, had gone to take his place.

"Here I was, with Richard so miraculously home, but due to sail so soon again. I thought of last summer, our three day honeymoon, and then his leaving. I went out on a bond tour in September. Richard knew that his ship was due in port in San Francisco some time that month, and we planned to meet there, if only for an hour. Well, his ship did come into San Francisco, but it came sooner than we expected. I was still touring the United States, helping to sell bonds—so we missed one another by three days. Once upon a time, I would have wept. Now I didn't. I knew I was merely experiencing what so many women were going through these days.

"I was gone on that tour for the entire month of September. I had, of course, finished 'Curie' after fourteen months of steady work, in August. I came home for two weeks and then went out on the Canadian Victory Drive. But now, with Richard beside me, to get the news concerning my uncle and the last of my cousins to leave home! I thought of all my men folk, so peace-loving, so essentially gentle in spirit, and all of them in uniform."

Greer stopped, and the tears shone

Beautiful Carale Landis attended premiere of "Lady In the Dark" with Capt. James Dempsey. Carole's husband was due in town later.

At Macambo Jane Withers is squired by a new beau, Eric Sinclair. Jane is still playing youthful parts but you see she's grawing up.

in her eyes. The California twilight stole into the room.

Greer started speaking again. "Those bond tours were a revelation to me of the power of movies and the power of any performer. I've worked so steadily in the past two years—from 'Mrs. Miniver' and 'Random Harvest' to 'Madame Curie'—that I have seen almost no one here in Hollywood at all. My circle of friends is very small, and since Richard has been gone I've had only a most occasional small dinner party—my mother, my producer, Sidney Franklin and his wife, the Mervyn LeRoys. But on the bond tour, I saw not only America, in all its glory, but my fellow workers in this industry. I got to know that wonderful person, Jimmy Cagney. I met the girls in my own studio, little Kathryn Grayson, Judy Garland, Lucille Ball. Did they make me feel abashed! There they were, wearing those exquisite costumes designed for them for their musical comedies, which are certainly the most ravishing costumes ever created. There they were, able to sing and dance and bring any house down. And there I was, with no costume to guide me, having played drab 'period' ladies for so long, and merely making a speech. But that speech did help. It wrote itself when I was on board the train, starting out, and it did sell some bonds, at least.

"When I came home and knew I had missed Richard, I went visiting hospitals. There are wards that are very hard to go into, wards of which we are not permitted to tell too much. But there are suffering, lonely boys in them, boys wounded in action.

"I was happy when I was asked to go on a second Canadian bond tour because of my being British by birth, and because they are great people up there and had been so responsive and cordial when I was there before. Somehow I feel that this activity, the bond tours, the camp and hospital visits, the Canadian tour, is about the most useful kind of fighting in this war that an actress can do.

"One kind of fighting, I mean. The other is helping to make pictures that will radiate cheerfulness, knowledge, good will and courage. Up until now, it has been a beloved profession with me. I have always been happy in the work I have chosen, but now—well, it is almost like a mission. Motion pictures are such a wonderful medium with an unlimited capacity for being a useful force in the world.

"I am humbly thankful that I so accidentally got pushed into playing the kind of roles I have; the loving women, the Mrs. Chips and Mrs. Gladney and Mrs. Miniver and Marie Curie. I wish there were time to show you some of the thousands of letters that come every week from the men far away at war and from the folks they left behind them. There is an ideal that we have got to keep alive, the dream that must have no ending: the power of love and the home, and of loving women in the home. In motion pictures we can portray the miracle, the tenderness, the healing of love, to help people to have faith in its power to conquer the hatred and death now loose upon our world."

Only a brave woman with a fighting heart could have said those words. But you agree, don't you, that they prove why Greer Garson is now the screen's first lady, and why she will remain that just so long as she chooses.

TELL MOM YOU SAW ME

him, but for Don. Everything the boy liked best—barbecued spareribs with apple-sauce and candied yams, touched off by a huge chocolate cake—was put before him: Flynn was honored to realize he was only sitting in for a soldier in a parka.

Like everyone else, Jack Benny came back from his trip to North Africa, Iran, England, Ireland—loaded with messages for wives, sisters, sweethearts. And, of course, Mom.

But Jack, himself, has a message for you and you and you.

"While Anna Lee, Wini Shaw, Larry Adler and I were in London visiting the hospitals," Benny said, "I noticed we were never allowed in Ward 8. We were quite free to go into any other ward, so finally I asked why that particular one was closed to us.

"The reason I got was such a sad one—and so useless," he went on, "that I know you can help. Ward 8 was filled with boys who couldn't take it. The mental cases. And psychiatrists had found that some of these cases were aggravated by the letters from home.

"So be careful what you write. Don't tell of domestic troubles, of family quarrels or illnesses or infidelities." He was intensely earnest about it. "There's no law against writing to ask for a divorce but—have a heart—don't do it. Mothers, don't write that your son's wife is stepping out, that his girl's untrue.

"Your boy's doing a tremendous job—with every ounce of his strength and courage. If he cracks, don't let it be your fault."

And, speaking of writing to ask for a divorce, Joel McCrae, to his own astonishment, played Mr. Fix-it for a sailor he met in North Africa. The boy, almost in tears, showed him a letter that had just come from his young wife in Atlanta. Flatly, without giving reasons or explanation, she demanded a divorce. The lad was so bewildered, so unhappy and helpless that McCrae, with misgivings, could only promise to help him.

As soon as he got back to the States, he started out on a bond-tour which eventually took him to Atlanta. He looked up the address given him and was met at the door by a very young girl, very, very expectant.

To see Joel McCrae, the movie star, standing there was almost too much to believe and to find out he was trying to help her was beyond imagination. But, with great patience and skilful cross-examination, he finally found out what was the matter.

Oh, yes, she loved Ralphie; no, there wasn't anybody else. Then why did she want a divorce? Now hold onto your hats when you learn the reason: she'd heard that sailors have a girl in every port, so she wanted to get herself and the impending child out of the way so Ralphie could have his fun where he found it!

After mending this slightly-cracked romance, Joel stopped off in Chicago between trains to visit the mother of a non-commissioned officer he had met in Italy. The boy's father had just died and he was worried about the mother's state of mind and her finances.

Joel spent more than an hour in the humble flat, listening to stories of the boy's childhood told in an accent so heavy it was hard to understand—and he was able to write the lad that the mother was well, meeting her grief bravely and had found a job which supplemented the income lost when the father died.

Bob Hope long-distanced Dallas and startled the wife of a soldier he'd met in Algiers by calling her a pet nickname that only she and the soldier knew.

Una Merkel and Phyllis Brooks were with Gary Cooper on that trip to the Southwest Pacific and Una dissolves in tears when she talks of the bravery and staunchness and fine spirit of the boys.

"There just weren't any eggs in Bizerte," said Adolphe Menjou, "but a mess sergeant made me an offer of an omelette in exchange for a telephone-call to his grandmother when I got back."

Menjou, well-known for the fact that there's more than hair under those natty hats, accepted the offer with alacrity, as well as another in Casablanca by which he was richer one red-felt fez in exchange for a letter to the seven-year-old daughter of an infantryman.

Lovely Anna Lee, just back from more than five months overseas, could well take the prize at this point for the Little-but-oh-my Club. She outlasted two troups of entertainers—eight weeks with Jack Benny and another stretch with Menjou—and then went off on her own for six weeks, hitchhiking by plane through Sicily, Italy, North Africa, Iran, Egypt and down the Gold Coast.

Her address-book is full of numbers she is calling and names of people she's writing letters to. In her travels, she met one flier five times in as many different hospitals.

"He'd had a piece of shrapnel through the jugular vein," she said, "and was a pretty sick boy. But each time I met him, as we both progressed toward the States, he was a little better."

The last time they met was in a hospital in Dakar where he was waiting transfer home.

"We'd become very good friends by this time," she went on, "and he told me how worried he was about his mother in Miami. She had heard nothing since the official War Department notification and of course had no idea where or how badly he was wounded.

"I was so glad I got to Miami a little before he did so I could tell her just what his condition was and how well he was getting on."

These are a few of the stories the big planes bring back. Other ships are going out every few days with other troups. When these people come home, they will say just about what the others have said:

"It's a privilege to go. We can hardly keep back the tears as we stand on those makeshift stages and look into the faces of those boys.

"That surge of eager, simple friendliness, that undercurrent of desperate homesickness, that grim spirit of getting a bad job over with as well and as quickly as possible, has transformed us into a group of the elect, the very, very fortunate few civilians who have been permitted to go to them.

"Anything we can do for them is little enough."

name to O'Connor. Mom went into show business with him. As soon as one of us kids was born, Mom carried us out on the stage at the earliest possible moment and took bows. This was always good for several curtain calls. The moment we could walk we were in the act.

First time I took a bow, in my mother's arms, I was four months old. When I was eight months, my Dad carried me out on the stage of the Blackstone Theater in Chicago. He held me up by the back of my triangles and I did the Black Bottom in mid-air.

There were seven of us kids, born in as many towns scattered over the eastern part of the United States. Five are dead now. Three died at birth. My brother Billy, who would be thirty now, died three years ago last Christmas. My sister Arlene, who would be twenty-three, was killed when I was sixteen months old. She was pushing me along the street in my baby buggy and, right in front of the theater where our act was playing, an automobile struck her. She died instantly. I don't know how I escaped.

After Arlene was killed, the family pulled itself together, changed the act and went on. Nine weeks later, in Brockton, Massachusetts, my Dad dropped dead of a heart attack. That left Mom, my brothers Jack and Billy, and me. Again the act was changed. Mom took in an acrobat, name of Lou Fletcher, to replace Dad. It didn't work. Only an O'Connor can replace an O'Connor. Soon Fletcher was out and the remaining O'Connors carried on.

Mom was so lonely for Arlene she tried to make me look like a girl. She let my hair grow and kept me in dresses as long as she could, and I would. That's how I came by the Buster Brown haircut which I wore until I was eight years old. Then I got rid of it by charging into a barber shop, on my own, and demanding a "man's haircut." Mom wept like that character, Niobe, when she saw it.

Thus, you can see, I really grew up back stage. When I was thirteen months old, I was doing hand stands. When I was four I was doing comedy routines with my brothers. When I was five, I was hoofing. I started singing when I was six. The first song I sang on "any stage" was "Keep Your Sunny Side Up" and after that, "I'm Looking At The World Through Rose-Colored Glasses" was my best number for some time. And like I said, when we worked circuses, I did a spot of trouping with Trampoline acts, animal acts, jugglers, wire acts, the works.

This made me no Little Lord Fauntleroy. Instead, I was the theater pest. First thing I can remember (I must have been three) was an impulse I had to run across the stage while the act was on, just to see what would happen. What happened was a licking. Later, I broke windows, hid props and make-up kits, heckled the stage-hands and performers generally.

For example, at one theater in Detroit, we were working with an orchestra that came up out of the pit on one of those platforms operated by the hydraulic system. On our previous engagement, a Bearded Lady had given me a BB gun. I got a bright idea. I turned off the lights backstage, climbed into the flies and, as the orchestra began to rise, I took aim and potted the musicians one by one. By the time the platform came fully into view of the audience, only three of the sixteen musicians had stuck it out.

Quite often, too, when I was a kid, I'd worry my mother by staying away from the theater and busking. Busking, in case you don't know, means doing songs and dances and patter and stuff in cafes, or on street corners, scooping up the loose change which is flung at you. Usually, I busked for the heck of it and used the easy pickings to buy my mother a hunk of jewelry at the dime store or to buy a new hat and cane for myself.

Sometimes, when the act had had a long layoff and no bookings in sight and dimes were thin, my brothers and I'd go out and get some by this same busking. Mom didn't approve. It wasn't "genteel" and she thought it very unprofessional.

Matter of fact, though, and in spite of the ups and downs the act went through, we usually had quite a bit of money. When we did, my brother Jack invariably bought a swanky car. Once in Buffalo, New York, just as we were to pull out of there, Jack got a beautiful Stutz touring job. It had been swell weather but, just as we left town, a storm came up. The thermometer dropped to 65 degrees, then to 45, then 25 in the space of an hour. Then the snow began falling. I never saw so much snow in my life. Thirty or forty miles out of town, on a country road, we had engine trouble. In spite of the white fur rugs (we always had white fur rugs in our cars when we were in the dough) and the newspapers we stuffed in cracks, we were about to die of exposure when a snow plough came along. We yelled at the men driving it. They ignored us. Just as they were about to pass on and leave us there to die, one of them shouted, "My name's Murphy—what's yours?" It didn't really seem the time for formal introductions but we yelled back, our voices almost lost in the screams of the wind, "Ours is O'Connor!"

"Well, my Saints," Murphy came back at us, as he began to edge the snow plough toward us, "why the divil didn't ye say so? Thought you were Swedes and we were going to leave ye be!"

In 1933, working in the State Theater in Long Beach, California, we were eating in a cafeteria one night when the building began to shiver and sway. People yelled "Earthquake!" and went crazy. I was crushed flatter than a piece of tissue paper. Jack got pushed through a plate glass door and almost cut his thumb off. But somehow, and in less than five minutes, we got together, my mother, brothers and I, and were in the Buick.

It's out of this world, the way the O'Connors survive.

Around this time, Jack's daughter, Patsy O'Connor, got a contract at 20th Century-Fox. Shirley Temple was just becoming a big star then and little girls were in demand. Patsy made about five pictures all told. I never thought of the movies for me. Back into vaudeville I went.

But in 1937, going into '38, we came to Hollywood again. We were doing a benefit for the Motion Picture Relief Fund at the Biltmore Bowl. Bing Crosby and Fred MacMurray were just about to start production on "Sing, You Sinner," and they were looking for a kid about my age. Wesley Ruggles, the director, saw me at that benefit and so I did the "Small Fry" number in "Sing, You Sinner." In the year that followed, I worked in eleven pictures. I was in "Men With Wings"; and in "Beau Geste" I played Gary Cooper as a boy. But the best parts for me were in "Son of the Legion" and "Tom Sawyer." Then I went to Warner Brothers and played Eddie Albert as a boy in "On Your Toes."

At this point, the family was preparing to take the act to Australia. I decided to do personal appearances with them for the four weeks remaining before they were to sail. Then I'd return to Hollywood. Three weeks after we started out, my brother Billy died at my uncle's house in Danville.

Party for Vice President Henry A. Wallace which was held in rambling Beverly Hills Hotel brought out Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cotten among large array of movieland notables.

His going changed the family's plans—and the act. It needed me now, so out I went for another two years. I began to grow up in earnest. I had responsibilities now that Billy was gone. I began to watch other performers. By taking off the assembly line everything I saw others do and everything I had done myself in the past, I began to develop my own individual style of working.

I know I was at my best then, yet our fortunes were at their lowest. Patsy joined the act, making it a threesome with Jack and me, but work was very scarce. For the first time in the history of the O'Connor family, we thought we were stuck. Just as we reached the all-time low, my agent wired me that Universal wanted me for a part in "What's Cooking?"

I didn't really want to go back to pictures. I hate routine, prefer the chancy life of one-night stands on the road to fixed salaries and the thing that practical folks call "security." But I didn't have any choice. I did the picture. It didn't do anything except feed me. Then I made two others and they fizzled like firecrackers, too.

Someone said to me, "You can't get back in pictures. You've been away too long." That roused the challenger in me. I told him in no uncertain words, "I'll get back!"

I started going when I got a good part in "Get Hep to Love." I started going, too, because one man had faith in me. Ken Goldsmith. Ken died six months ago, but if it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be anywhere now.

After "Get Hep to Love," anyway, I really started going. "Mr. Big" was a solid one. Ever since, I've been in there pitching. "It Comes Up Love," "Top Man," "This Is The Life," "Three Cheers for the Boys," "Patrick the Great," "Chip Off the Old Block," "The Merry Monahans" are tumbling and will continue to tumble out of Universal's hat long after I've earned my wings I hope.

And as for that theater of war, we'll wow 'em!

But please try to remember me a bit, will yuh?

new roles that are to come to her.

Proper investments, which will increase in value after the war, are offered after the first of May. Speculation, as such, should be avoided.

Home will always provide her greatest inner security, but July and August may hold promises to fulfill which should take her away from home toward public appearances. They will be two busy months, in any event. And if she has planned carefully, or wishes to escape routine for a short time, she could plan a short vacation. An ideal place for this would be in her own home.

This is a year offering much towards consolidating her possessions and her place in the hearts of her public, present and future. This year follows a year which has been one of great growth, and through some separation from business activities has taught much of better understanding.

SNARE A HUSBAND

even at that looking at price tags three times before you dared spend the money," she recalls. "It's a thrilling thing to have your own salary—a big one—to spend on whatever appeals to you.

"I'm ambitious or something. I hate to think of going back to counting pennies, to taking something I don't like because it costs $2.98 less than the thing I want."

Susanna threw back her head and took swift dancing steps, so that her long fair hair streamed after her like a banner.

"I'm happy!" she cried. "I'm on top of the world! I've been happy so long I'm afraid. I'm either right up on top or so far down I'm buried. I'm temperamental. That's not the same thing as temper, because I have a bad temper, too—but I know I can control that. But temperament is mood. If you are low, you are low, no foolin'! If you are happy, there you sit, on top of the world!"

Susanna hopes to meet that One Man and marry before she's twenty-two.

"If he had to go to war, I'd marry him right away, not wait for him to come back. Then at least we'd have a little time together. If he came back wounded, I'd still love him—maybe more than ever, because I'd be so sorry, and I'd feel my love could help cure him. And perhaps it could. If he came back a different man from the one who left me, a man grown so far beyond me that we had no meeting ground, we'd separate.

"I hate the thought of divorce—that's all that would hold me back from marriage. And I'd never go around with a married man or try to take one from his wife. If I'm unlucky enough to fall in love with one, I'll make myself forget him."

Susanna drew a deep breath and checked up on herself sharply. "That's what I think now. You never know. But I can't imagine myself breaking up a home. In the first place, I wouldn't let myself get involved with a man who was married. I shan't handicap myself by going with married men, with men who are failures, or who couldn't make me happy. I know what I want, and I think I'll recognize My Man when he comes along.

"I couldn't live if I didn't sing. It's not my career I care for, it's my singing. And you can't do my kind of singing unless you have a career. The man I marry must understand that. Oh, I want a normal life—I want a husband and children—but I just can't live unless I sing!"

The temperamental young star of "Phantom of the Opera" and "Angela" lives alone in a small apartment, because her music is all-important.

"When I can afford a large house, my family will live with me," she says, "but on his present job my father must get up before dawn and go to bed very early, so we can't work it out. Sometimes I have to go early to bed too, because of a studio call—but generally I can stay up late playing my records. If my family lived with me. I'd keep Dad awake. He'd say, 'Go ahead, it doesn't bother me,' because he's a darling. But I'd know it wasn't fair. When I get my big house, I'll have one room soundproofed.

"Right now, though, I'm too happy and busy to worry about anything, even the One Man coming along."

The girl's eye view of Youth's 1944 problems differs. Over on the Paramount lot, the co-stars of "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" considered them. Dressed alike in pale blue satin dresses, model 1923, with low waistlines and long front panels, they were still as different as mignonette and hibiscus.

Diana Lynn, seventeen and too sunny to have moods, is a little girl still, in spite of stardom. Her parents have a charming home, are in comfortable circumstances, and Diana is a daughter in that home and pays no board. Her father takes care of her money, investing half of it in a trust fund for her future, and the rest, except for an allowance which Diana spends on clothes and studio expenses, goes into war bonds.

"I love clothes," she sighs, "but I don't think I'm extravagant. Every season I plan my wardrobe carefully, trying to spend as wisely as possible, so that my hats and accessories will go with different outfits. I'm too young to wear things that are too expensive. It wouldn't be good taste."

Even if tremendous success suddenly catapulted Diana into a high income bracket, she wouldn't leave home until she married.

"I'd hate to live alone. We're so happy at home that I'll never want to leave. But I can understand how a girl in an unhappy home might feel she must get away and be independent. It's probably right for her, for living where people aren't sweet and kind must be dreadful."

Diana has no special fellow in sight. She isn't much concerned with the prediction of a male shortage for she's romantic enough to believe there will be someone for her when she's ready.

"I wouldn't marry a boy who is going into the service now, because I'm not old enough to consider marriage yet," she declared. "A good many of the boys who are going to war are also very young and they'll have to finish growing up in frightful conditions. They'll live through experiences we can't even imagine. When they come home they'll be beyond any little girl who stayed here. They'll need a woman to straighten them out. I'm sure I'd not be capable of understanding a returned soldier as a wife should.

"As to the seven girls to one man—if I can't have the man I want, I'll never take second best. Not that my man is a definite person, he's merely an idea. He needn't be handsome. Looks aren't important to me. But he must be kind. Consideration, thoughtfulness, a sense of humor—these are important. Above all, I must respect him and he must respect me. Then our marriage will succeed.

"He needn't have money, but I wouldn't care to support my husband. The chances are he couldn't earn picture money, but as a rule a star has a short career when she reaches the fabulous-money stage. If a man had a useful career and could support himself, I wouldn't complain. If he had nothing, I'd hesitate to marry him until he got started on his career, because a single man will often take a chance and get ahead—he can afford to fail, if necessary—while a married man is afraid to take it and so loses.

"I wouldn't like to hamper any man. The trouble with young marriages often is that the boy hasn't had a chance to get a start on his career and to work out what he wants to do. First thing you know he's stuck in a round hole, though he's a square peg. He and his wife go into debt, and presently they are overwhelmed before they can build a life together.

"I'm sensible enough to know you can't plan your life completely. You can't say, 'I'll do this and not that'—and never change. Life decides for you. But I can dream, can't I?"

Gail Russell admits that her plans don't include marriage before she's at least twenty-five. She owes too much to those who have helped her get her start in pictures.

"Not money debts," she says with a flash of her startlingly blue eyes, "but encouragement, advice, trust and confidence in me when I had none in myself. I must succeed to justify their faith in me. Marriage means divided effort, and that's not for me—yet."

Ultimately, Gail hopes to marry a dark-haired, blue-eyed man (her own coloring), not too goodlooking, who can kid her out of her moods, who is reliable, self-confident, and able to cope with the world. If she can't have him, she'll take nobody, but go on like Kipling's cat-who-walks-by-herself-all-on-her-wild-lone.

"I have black moods. They come down on me without warning. Then I have a good cry and run off to walk around the block," she confessed. "My great ambition is to buy acres and acres of land and have horses to ride when I get into those lows. I want lots of space and a fast horse.

"First, though, I want to buy a home for my family—a nice, big, comfortable home with things the way my family would like them. After that, comes the ranch for myself."

Gail wouldn't dream of marrying a soldier before he went off to war. "Girls take too great a chance if they marry now, and no girl in her teens is old enough to marry," says this nineteen-year-old. "I know I feel too unsettled myself."

For example, a girl friend a year younger than Gail fell madly in love with a soldier a year older. They wanted to marry at once and the girl made life miserable for her family until they consented. The marriage was arranged, the girl had her wedding gown and they'd planned the honeymoon, when the boy was ordered to the South Pacific. He called to say he had decided not to marry the girl.

"He said he loved her too much to do it," related Gail. "She might have a baby and have to bring it up alone. He might come back crippled and she'd be stuck with him. He wanted to protect her. Now her family is crazy about him because they know from that that he really loves her. But it's awfully hard on that girl, just sitting, waiting."

Gail's special pal is her father, just as happens in the picture, "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay."

"I wouldn't want an apartment away from home if I had all the money there is. In a career, you need advice and help that nobody can pay for, and your family will give you that. They don't mind telling you for your own good when you're wrong. Other people hesitate, either because they like to flatter you, or because what's it to them?

"I'm too ambitious, maybe. I like clothes, but they don't matter. Nothing matters except my career. There's so much work ahead, so far to go, so much to learn, that I want to give my career my undivided attention—and that wouldn't be fair, if I married.

"Yes, I hope to marry someday. But if I'm one of the seven who finds no man she really wants, I'll take nobody!"

After the sneak preview of "Broadway Rhythm," M-G-M officials smiled at each other and said, "We're afraid we have a new star on our hands!"

That new star is Gloria de Haven, sweet and eighteen, with a long, fair bob and great gray-blue eyes.

She's not in love yet, even though she's very steadily dating Mickey Rooney, but she believes that love is the only reason for marriage, and nothing else counts.

"It would be wonderful if I happened to fall in love with a man who had plenty of money," she said, "but if not, I expect love will be marvelous anyway.

"I might marry money and my husband would lose it. Then I'd give him whatever I had, or go to work until he got on his feet. But if he developed into the kind of a man who would expect me to support him, I couldn't go on. When respect died, my love would probably die.

"Even if I fall terribly in love with a boy, I hope I won't marry him before he goes off to war, because I'm so young. Girls who are very young haven't had time to have much fun, and it's silly to tie yourself down to a dreary time of waiting all alone. The war drags on, your husband is away, you can't go out with anyone else once you're married—at least I couldn't.

"I have two girl friends who have married soldiers. One was married for six months before her husband left, and she takes their separation in her stride. She has a job, works hard in a war plant, keeps up her home at night and writes him every day. She's adjusted to waiting for him.

"The other girl had just three days with her husband before he left. Now he's overseas and she seldom hears from him. She hadn't known him long before they married, and now she's beginning to forget what he looks like. She's blue about staying home every night, never doing anything exciting. She's beginning to wonder if she loves him or not.

"I'd hate to be like that. I'm old-fashioned. I believe in love—maybe not at first sight, but I think you know. No one would ever persuade me that it isn't necessary to fall in love, your husband will teach you to love him afterward! I'll fall in love or I won't marry!"

As to money, Gloria belongs to a theatrical family that has had its share of ups and downs. She's tried doing without money, and she didn't find it a pleasant experience.

"But money in itself isn't important to me," she asserts. "I can get along. I don't care to have people give me big things. I like a man to remember to call me up when I'm ill, to recall that I like a certain kind of rose and to send a single one rather than a truckload of orchids or gardenias, to know my favorite song or color, to find the book I've been looking for, or even just to say some lovely thing to me at the right time."

Gloria can't imagine living alone. Her mother and sister are always there to hear her lines, help her select clothes, tell her what to do.

"If I marry and have children," says Gloria, "I'll give up my career while they are small. No one can take the place of your mother when you're little. But I hope not to have babies right away. My husband and I should have time to get acquainted so we can work out our problems without complications. In that case, I'd continue my career. My husband would be away daytimes, so why not work?"

"I don't know about love yet," she said thoughtfully. "Maybe it's stronger than you are and I'd be helpless against it. If the man and his wife were unhappy together, and there was no point in giving him up, I'd be tempted to go on with it. But if there were children, if the wife still loved him and he was just sort of straying, I'd surely step out of the picture. It would be up to any girl to sacrifice herself if she measured her own happiness against the wife's and family's. I hope I'd be big enough to do that.

"Somehow, I don't think that problem's going to come along!"

PAPER
PACKS A WAR PUNCH!
FIGHT WASTE!

"Never mind wrapping it — our Army needs the paper!"

That's the idea, Mrs. Jones.

That's the spirit.

Folks all over the U. S. A. must join with their local storekeepers in a real all-American all-out drive to conserve paper by using less of this essential war material.

Every single piece of paper and paperboard (cardboard, boxboard) you manage to do without means just that much more ammunition for our invasion forces.

Ammunition? Yes, and weapons and food and precious medical supplies and blood plasma. For, as Major General E. B. Gregory, Quartermaster General of the Army, says: "The packing and packaging of Quartermaster Corps supplies for shipment to men on the fighting fronts is fully as important as producing the supplies themselves." And practically every one of the 700,000 different items convoyed to our boys is wrapped for protection in paper or paperboard or both!

No wonder the war need for paper grows daily. No wonder current paper production cannot meet this steadily mounting demand unless you and every other man and woman join Mrs. Jones in using less paper! The simple directions at bottom of this page tell you just how to do this—at the store, in your office and at home.

This and the other magazines, although using only 5 per cent of the paper supply, are saving 450 million pounds of paper this year—to release it for vital war needs.

AT THE STORE. Unless it's absolutely necessary for their protection, don't ask to have things wrapped. Never ask to have boxed or bottled goods wrapped. Carry your own shopping bag or market basket to help save the storekeeper's precious paper bags.

AT THE OFFICE. Help your company devise methods to reduce the amount of paper, stationery, etc., used in carrying on its business. If you're employed by a package goods manufacturer, help him figure out ways to save on vital paperboard.

AT HOME. Make paper stretch! Use smaller sheets of writing and wrapping paper; conserve paper towels, facial tissues. Share the printed word; give this magazine to a neighbor. Never burn used paper; prepare it for your local committee on paper salvage.

girl friends turn out to be "Ida," "Margie," "Louise," "Josephine," "Rose Marie," "Diane," "Charmaine," and "Liza." . . . The band of Les Brown and the voice of Butch Stone are doubled up on "A Good Man Is Hard To Find" and "Bizet Has His Day." "Bizet" is a novelty and "Good Man" is the oldie which has had a shot in the arm lately . . . You people who like blues will want Columbia's Okeh release of "I'm Going To Move To The Outskirts of Town" and "Hard Hearted Woman" by Big Bill and His Chicago Five . . .

The VICTOR company hasn't as yet settled differences with the Musicians' Union, so they are still unable to use bands. But their number one gal, Dinah Shore, has done a good record with a background of mixed voices. The tunes are "Now I Know" from her picture, "Up In Arms," and "I Didn't Sleep A Wink Last Night."

CAPITOL Records offer us "Mairzy Doats" once more, but with the Pied Pipers and Paul Weston's orchestra. They also do "A Journey To a Star." The best part of this pressing is the fine tenor saxophone work by one Eddie Miller . . . Andy Russell's first commercial effort comes off very nicely. He does "Besame Mucho" and "You're The Dream" with Albert Sack conducting the music. Andy is the boy who is getting such a big buildup on the Blue Network . . . That Mercer lad is front and center with "San Fernando Valley" and "Someone's In The Kitchen With Dinah." Both sides are right up Johnny's alley. Paul Weston is the leader man and The Barries, a female threesome, assist on the lyrics. Johnny discovered the girls on a Cleveland Radio station last year and was instrumental in bringing them to Hollywood.

ON THE BEAM:

One of the best musical programs on the air is the "Connie Boswell Presents" show over the Blue Network on Wednesdays. It's nice to be able to hear her regularly again . . . Guy Lombardo and The Royal Canadians are doing a Sunday series over the Blue with a different guest each week. You'll have to check your local papers for time and station.

Spike Jones, Bob Burns' "maestro," was elected King of Corn again this year by Downbeat Magazine, which accounts for that big smile he has been wearing. Spike's latest novelty sensation is a little ditty entitled "There's A Fly On My Music." . . . Frances Langford has been signed by RKO to a two-picture a year deal and she will also be seen in Republic's "Jamboree." . . . Kay Kyser started his seventh year on NBC with a wonderful record to look back on. During his radio career he has never missed a single broadcast . . . If you listen to "One Man's Family," you've heard their pretty theme song, "Patricia." The producers of the show have had so many inquiries as to where the song could be purchased that they have published it and you may now buy same in sheet music form . . . There is a rumor about Hollywood town that Alice Faye may soon have her own half-hour radio program on which she would sing and do a dramatic spot, with musical help of hubby Phil Harris . . . Ray Anthony, the twenty-one-year-old trumpet veteran from the Jimmy Dorsey and Glenn Miller bands, has donned a sailor suit. He is heard each Friday over the Blue Network on the "Meet Your Navy" broadcast . . . The Sportsmen Quartet is just about the busiest musical foursome in Hollywood. They are heard on the Sealtest Show, and with Burns and Allen, Ginny Simms, Groucho Marx, and Eddie Cantor . . . Horace Heidt is featuring a new vocal group on his "Heidt For Hires" airings. They are The High-Lights, seven voices composed of a girls' quartet and a men's trio . . . If "Pistol Packin' Mamma" is a hit with the boys overseas, Herbert Marshall should get some of the credit. When he was a guest on the Eddie Cantor program a few months back, he sang the tune and brought down the house. When his pals, Gary Cooper and Spencer Tracy, were looking around for musical material to do on their overseas trips to entertain our fighting men, Marshall suggested the song to them and ended up teaching it to them. Both did the tune in their acts and when they returned recently they told Marshall that they had been "wows" with it. George Raft is also using "P. P. M." on his present tour in England and Martha O'Driscoll and Errol Flynn sang it together for the boys in Alaska.

Kitty Kallen cut out from the Jimmy Dorsey band and joined Bing Crosby on the Kraft show. Her parting with Dorsey was entirely friendly and Jimmy is pulling for her to make a success on her own. Billy Burton, who is managing Kitty, also guides the destinies of Helen Forrest, Dick Haymes and the King Sisters, so he should have an easy time of making the Kallen lass a big solo attraction.

JAM NOTES:

Artie Shaw is no longer leading Navy Band No. 501, the outfit with which he made his South Pacific tour. The band is still together, however, under the leadership of Sam Donahue, the tenor star who had a pretty good band of his own in peacetime. At this writing, Artie is in a Naval hospital in San Francisco recuperating from dengue fever which he contracted on one of the islands where his band played. Buddy Moreno has a new suit, done in a nice shade of olive drab, and he is singing his songs to a march tempo, being that he is now Private Moreno of the United States Army. His place with Harry James was taken by another Buddy, Buddy De Vito, former vocalist with Eddie Oliver's band in Chicago.

Jill Warren digs Buddy Moreno's identification bracelet at one of Buddy's last appearances with the Harry James band before he left to become a soldier boy.

When Harry knew that Moreno was going into the service, he started casting about for a new singer and one night he heard De Vito with Oliver's band on a Cocoa Cola show. He decided right then and there he was the boy. So he placed a long distance call to Buddy D. V. and asked him if he would be interested in joining the James band. De Vito was so thrilled and excited that he accepted the job without even asking about salary. All Buddy De Vito wanted to know was when Harry James wanted him to start.

Ray Eberle is on a short leave from the movie cameras and is playing theatre and night club engagements in the east. While he is away from California he is subleasing his house to Hal McIntyre. Hal and Ray are old friends from early Glenn Miller days . . .

THE JAZZ PLATE:

BOWEN CHARLETON TUFTS III

say, 'I'm better looking than he is—gosh, there's nothing to it!' Meantime, those kids don't think about getting any training or experience, and they're going to wind up pretty disappointed. That's why I wanted to explain it."

The Tufts explaining something, we'd like to add, is a much more delightful process than it appears on paper. It comes out, not all in one piece, but in pleasantly lazy phrases, mixed up with grins, shrugs, an occasional head-scratching or ear-pulling, and a frequent "Hi'yah, Bing," "Hi'yah, Laddie," and so on, as acquaintances stroll by.

That "Hi'yah" gesture, performed with a vague sort of waft of the hand past the forehead, is destined to become as distinctive a trademark as Gable's dimpled smile, Paul Henreid's two cigarettes, Bogart's stiff-lipped dialogue, and Skelton's dood-ing it. Making a bond selling appearance last week, Sonny walked out on the stage, lifted hand to forehead, and with one voice the audience screamed, "Hi'yah Kansas!" Roles may come and roles may go, but it looks like "Kansas" (in "So Proudly We Hail") is going to stick.

That screaming, led by the well-known Bobby Socks Brigade, is quite an experience, says this latest victim: "I don't know what other fellows do, but I jumped! I never realized before what Sinatra goes through. That guy must have nerves of iron!"

With "I Love a Soldier" completed and awaiting release, the Boston Biggie is currently working in "Bring on the Girls" (plural) with Veronica Lake being the girl (singular). Lunching in the studio commissary between scenes, he came in wearing a well-filled pair of over-sized Navy dungarees, and confidentially, we expected to watch him gnaw—but gently, of course—on a raw beef bone. He ordered instead a crisp and dainty salad bowl, and poked at it like he was afraid to hurt it.

"Been working so steady since I got out here, I don't get much chance for exercise. No exercise, no eat," he explained briefly.

Sonny tips the scales at 208 pounds, all of which is at present conveniently distributed for handling with the graceful awkwardness which makes his audience love every hunk of it. Since Veronica, eye-bang and all, weighs a well-stacked 103, their screen appearance together is going to have all the novelty of a tug-boat trailing after its dinghy—which is exactly the producer's idea, of course.

In this picture, too, will come the culmination of Sonny's twenty years of vocal effort and training. He sings, but not the seriously-studied operatic arias which at one time won him encouragement from the Met, nor even the sophisticated ballads which once earned him a living in night clubs and on the stage. His song will be "Egyptian Ella," a little number with which he used to sometimes delight, and always surprise, family friends at the age of six. "Ella" is a parlor song, depending on whose parlor you are in, and with her "wiggle and shake, like a nervous snake," she is sure to become a favorite with film fans.

Bowen Charleton the Third has always been a tradition breaker. His parents hoped to have him go into finance, a line the family had followed ever since Peter Tufts trailed the Mayflower into Boston in 1638. At the age of eight, however, he accompanied Tufts pere to an Eddie Cantor show and when after the performance he said, "Dad—would you mind if I do something like that when I'm big," Dad said, "Not at all—if you're good at it."

That was when Sonny really started warming up with the parlor concerts. His first public appearance was as a boy soprano in a church choir. Being practical as well as artistic, he had picked the church with "the best football team of any choir in New England." His first earned money was not from his entertainment ventures, but from digging dandelions on the Tufts estate. The grounds were well-tended by gardeners, of course, but he wanted a bicycle and Dad insisted he make a stab at earning it.

Looking back, Sonny knows he had just about the wisest father in the world. He never asked for anything in his life that he didn't get, but always he had to earn at least part of it by his own efforts. He prepped at Phillips-Exeter, and earned his own spending money by organizing his first band. He played piano well, but drums were his weakness, especially since he could sing best from the drum corner.

This scene took place at the Frank Sinatra air show which pulled in a million dollars for War Bonds; radio announcer Truman Bradley, funnyman Bert Wheeler, glamorous Annie Sheridan (behind the glasses), and at the extreme right, The Voice himself.

When he enrolled for his college education at Yale, he broke another tradition. The Tufts tribe had two scholastic "musts." One was that a Tufts must always attend Tufts College, founded by a forbear. Usually, the family females went there. The men invariably went to Harvard—Sonny's father, eight uncles, and later his younger brother, were all Harvard men. So Sonny went to Yale—and straightway became a legend.

He started out by spending two years as a Freshman. This was mostly because he had tackled so many activities; studying was extra-curricular. He went out for football and crew. He landed two columns to write for the Yale Daily News and made the staff of The Record. And by this time he had five bands, all of them money makers. When all five bands were busy at various events, he did a sort of perambulating performance, showing up at various times of the evening to sing a few numbers with each.

He kids his college athletic prowess with complete frankness. "In football, I was what you call a 'waiting' tackle—waiting to get off the bench." As a matter of fact, he was a whiz at kicking off, usually starting the game by booting the ball and then retiring while the regular tackle entered the lineup. He rowed fifth oar, usually referred to as the "power house" position, and once beat Harvard—but it was on the third crew. He has a good record on a racing bicycle, and was a good skier until he went over a sixty foot cliff and sustained a broken pelvis.

Among the business ventures spasmodically attacked, was a summer of selling refrigerators, door to door. When he won a sales contest for unloading the most ice-boxes, he put the silver cup on the shelf—and the refrigerator business along with it. Usually he spent his summers shipping with his orchestra on Mediterranean cruises, making twenty-five Atlantic crossings in all. Once, he missed the boat and worked his way back on a freighter, chipping iron rust off pipes to earn his bunk and board.

The summer of his senior year, he listened to a ship-board concert by Tito Schipa, and a great change came over his ambitions. When he got off the boat he checked his drums at New York's Grand Central Station, and enroute home to Boston, reached a decision. He decided never to go back to the traps, and to bolster his determination to achieve the finer things of music, tore up his claim checks.

After graduation, he locked himself up in an apartment and spent two years learning operatic scores. Lohengrin was his favorite: "I sort of fancied myself riding in on that Swan Boat with feathers in my hat," he admits. Occasionally during this hermit existence, friends used to run into him and ask him where on earth he'd been. He'd confess and they'd say, "Aw, opera is okay, but you used to do swell with that Sweet Sue stuff."

HARRIS, 175 East Broadway, Dept. M-5, New York 2, N. Y.

"It was sure tough on my morale," he remembers.

In 1937, Sonny met and married Barbara Dare, a recital dancer from California. He still doesn't remember how he ever got up courage enough to propose, except that Barbara's announced intention of going to Mexico to study scared him into it. The proposal scene was staged in the doorway of her apartment, with one foot inserted in the door (ice-box salesman style) and he used his now-familiar "Kansas" technique, saying something like "How about it, kid?"

After six years of married life, he answers all questions as to his preference in women with, "I like 'em just like Barbara." And Barbara, a lovely girl with milky skin and ebony hair, says, "Living with Sonny is just like an adventure story — things happen that couldn't possibly happen with anyone else."

As an example, she quotes their recent experience when, looking for Hollywood living quarters, they answered an apartment ad. It turned out that Sonny didn't like the apartment but sat down to talk with the owners, and by the time dinner was served the maid put two extra places on as a matter of course. They stayed for dinner, and left without the people ever knowing they had entertained a movie star.

The nicest thing about being in pictures, he thinks, is being in pictures. Unlike those lofty creatures who claim they never see their films and abhor the sight of themselves on the screen, he admits to a certain pleasure in sitting in this spectator's row after a screen job is done.

"Sure I like myself on the screen. I keep thinking how much I look like my brother, Dave. I like him, and everything he does—so how could I help it? Did I tell you he's a hero now?" he adds proudly. "The folks just got word he was decorated in North Africa."

"Who's Who" and "Sing For Your Supper" were Sonny's Broadway shows, and before that there were night club engagements at such swank spots as The Glass Hat, the Famous Door and the Beachcombers. All of this came after his audition at the Met, when he learned he had an operatic future, all right, but it wouldn't pay much. He prefers a movie career because it allows him to get up with the sunrise instead of going to bed with it.

And about that name, "Sonny." He likes it better than "Junior" or "Brother," which might have been his fate.

"When I was a kid, I used to think it was my real name. Summertimes I used to have my head shaved, and when someone would run their hand across it—like people always want to do with shaved hair—they usually say something like 'Hello, Sonny' or 'How are you, Sonny?' I'd run home and tell my mother, 'Gosh, it's sure funny how everybody in this whole town knows me—they call me Sonny even before I tell them!'

"I never thought of using any other name. I'll never forget, when I graduated from Yale, the president read off 'Bowen Charleton Tufts III'—and then he looked up at me, astounded, and said, 'Why, Sonny!' Of course, he may just have been amazed to find out I'd actually earned a diploma—but anyhow, I've always thought if 'Sonny' was good enough for him, it's good enough for me!"

A HUSSEY IN LOVE

"And that," observed Mr. Bob Longenecker, "I still have to find."

Any relationship between this incident and the fact that, on the morning of December 20, 1941, Mr. Longenecker was in the Brown Derby preparing to have breakfast, is purely coincidental. Not one reliable witness, to date, has been able to swear that Cupid—in costume violating all Hays Office codes—was present that cold, brisk morning, or had been present in the mission when Mr. Longenecker first referred to marriage.

Definitely present in the Brown Derby was Miss Ruth Hussey of the sugar candy voice and the impertinently-tilted nose. She had met two girls friends for brunch, and one of the girls knew Bob Longenecker.

In the Derby, everyone goes visiting. To fail to table-hop at Vine and Hollywood is to be a social outcast with all those advertised ailments.

Quickly, Mr. Longenecker joined the three girls. Two of them were dated for the pro football game that afternoon, so they had to scamper. Ruth, however, was planning a mere radio rehearsal, so she was in no hurry at all. She had been in no hurry since she first clapped eyes on Mr. Longenecker.

"I'll sit with you until you've finished your breakfast," she announced in samaritan tones.

"Even unto the fifth cup of coffee?" asked Bob.

She said yes, so they turned to other topics. They discussed Miss Hussey's radio program; they discussed Mr. Longenecker's radio program. They definitely did not discuss the cognominal fact that it was something for a Hussey to have met a Longenecker.

They talked, at length, about good books they had read recently, and from that they comfortably attacked the question of first editions. "If you really want to see something handsome," Ruth suggested, "come with me to the book store next door." The move was seconded and passed unanimously.

What she wanted to point out was a twenty-volume set of Dickens, all first editions, all in perfect condition. The bindings were rich and rare, the illustrations some of the most imaginative of their era. The price for this array was a nonchalant $750.

They agreed that this was evidence of the great convenience of being rich folks. They sighed and turned resolute backs. They said, "The Dickens with it!"

Ruth said, "I have my car parked in the Derby lot. I'd be glad to drop you wherever you're going."

Bob was going down to the broadcasting station which was next door to the studio awaiting Ruth's appearance for rehearsal, so he hopped into the Hussey coupe. Not until many months later did Ruth learn that Bob's car had also been parked in the Derby lot. He simply rode with her because . . . well, gas wasn't rationed in those days, and six good tires were to be had by walking into the nearest dealer's and slapping cash on the counter, so there must have been moonlight reasons shining at high noon that day.

Miss Hussey from Mr. Longenecker. It contained Dickens' "Our Mutual Friend" in a two-volume first edition. An accompanying card explained that the $750 set was a trifle beyond his scope—but that, knowing how much she treasured fine books, he hoped she would enjoy adding these volumes to her library.

Immediately after Christmas Ruth came down with a heavy cold and had to cancel her social engagements. Glowering from her bed, she addressed the telephone, "Well, why don't you ring now?" She and Bob had missed telephonic connections repeatedly; she was in the habit of returning after a brief rush to the post office, the market, or the beauty shop, only to find a note to the effect that Mr. Longenecker had called and would call again.

However, in keeping with its usual exasperating deportment, the telephone refused to ring. The doorbell was much better behaved, however—it rang! When the housekeeper answered, a pleasant voice wanted to know if Miss Hussey were at home. The housekeeper said she was, but that unfortunately she was ill in bed.

"But I'm not asleep," protested a husky contralto. "Ask Mr. Longenecker to wait a moment and I'll see him . . . if he isn't afraid of common cold bugs."

She slipped into the warmest (and most dazzling) robe she owned, tied a ribbon around her head, and asked the surprised housekeeper to usher in the guest.

They talked and they talked. Bob was born in a small town in Pennsylvania, so he regaled her with tales of the Pennsylvania Dutch. He cited the instance of the sign posted on a front door: "Bell don't make—Bump." Meaning, of course, that the bell was out of order, so the caller must knock. And he told about the child explaining to a younger brother, "When the little red car comes, the train is all ain't"—which, when translated, sums up to the startling information that a caboose is found at the end of a train.

In exchange, Ruth told Bob about her girlhood in Providence, Rhode Island, and about her grooming days on Broadway. All things considered it was a wonderful visit, ending with Bob's saying he'd see her as soon as the cold was better. He was going to be pretty busy, but he'd telephone.

Bird voiced Ginny Simms has several men on the string. But shown dancing with Ensign Scollard Maas it looks like the fleet's in.

Before he had a chance to exercise a dial, Ruth was rehearsing at the radio station one afternoon—and in came Senor Longenecker. He waved. She waved. He approached a friend, talked in muted tones for a few moments, then left the studio. Very dull rehearsal. In a few moments he returned and found a seat. Very interesting rehearsal.

Someone entered, tapped him on the shoulder. So, grinning at Ruth, he again left the studio. Horrible rehearsal. Cues off, timing off. He returned and assumed his observer's post. Wonderful rehearsal.

The program director, pleased and astonished at the abrupt vitality of his pending broadcast, allowed everyone to leave early for dinner. Mr. Longenecker begged the pleasure of Miss Hussey's company. "But, instead of going to the Derby," he said, "I have another idea."

His other idea turned out to be the Huntington Hotel in Pasadena. There, gracious living is indented by the shadows of pepper trees, and glazed by the sheen of a full moon. Ruth is positive that the hotel must have some sort of contract with Diana, Olympian vice-president in charge of moons, because every time she has been there a full moon has been a feature of the night. (She has been there only twice.)

So, what with the delicious dinner, the candlelight, the music, the moonlight, and the pepper tree shadows, a solemn pact was made. Bob and Ruth were married seven weeks later (August, 1942)—in Santa Paula Mission, thus fulfilling a long-remembered dream.

They went to Arrowhead Springs for their honeymoon, but they had been there only a few days when the studio, oblivious to romance, ordered Ruth back for retakes. The retakes finished, Bob and Ruth hastened again to Arrowhead and were just unpacking their bags when Bob was called back for final physical tests before being inducted.

Since that time, married life for the Longeneckers has been quite similar to that of any other wartime wedded pair. Bob went through basic, qualified for O.C.S. and was shipped to Fort Monmouth, New Jersey, where he earned his gold bars. A few months ago he attained his promotion, so his title is now 1st Lieutenant Robert Longenecker of the Signal Corps.

While he was taking his basic, he spent as many week-ends as possible in the house he and Ruth were perfecting for a post-war matrimonial career. Ruth made it a practice to set aside all manner of mild household tasks for him. Because he was studying electrical theory and application, preparatory to entering O.C.S., she supplied him with a balky vacuum cleaner to test his newly won skill. He took it to pieces, polished, oiled, and rewired parts of it, put it back together again, and astonished himself and his wife by making the thing run. Ruth looked him over with a partisan eye. "And to think," she murmured, "that I married you only because I loved you."

Ruth's favorite vegetables are spinach and squash and she earned the undying suspicion of her relatives by feeding them these two items, plus the usual things, for Christmas dinner. Her husband, living up to his Pennsylvania Dutch departmentalism, is prejudiced in favor of such dishes as shoe-fly pie, apple strudel, cherry kuchen, and pretzels. Regularly he orders from Pennsylvania a shipment of pretzels, an antic which inspired one of Ruth's Christmas gifts.

She was wandering through a gift shop one day when she spied the oddest instrument she had seen in months. It consisted of a small, immobile red merry-go-round from which rose a slender cylindrical stick about eighteen inches high. She asked the salesgirl what it was.

"A pretzel-holder, of course," she said.

Ruth's eyes widened. "That, I'll buy!"

Ruth and Bob have had, since marriage, a progressive backgammon tournament, and an equally progressive gin rummy match. Whenever Bob gets leave they manage to play a few games, at miniscule stakes. The score, naturally, continues to mount. Oddly enough, Ruth never wins—so the conversation has advanced along these lines: Bob (in September), "You now owe me thirty-seven cents." Bob (in December), "You now owe me two dollars and fourteen cents." Bob (in March) "You are now in my debt for three dollars and seventy-two cents. Mrs. Longenecker never pays up, on the theory that one day she will make a killing and even the score—which now stands around $7.26.

Of such things is a happy marriage made: of pretzel holders and ceaseless backgammon games, and annual visits to Santa Paula Mission and the Huntington Hotel. Of first editions.

And of love.

THE LITTLE WIFE—HEDY LAMARR

and wanted to get back to work. At that time it seemed that John was being considered for the name role in Mr. Skeffington, but tests indicated that he didn't fit the part. So, once again, he asked for a release from his contract. "Wait two more months," he was urged.

Now a long period between pictures is likely to perforate the average man with serious doubts of his value. Not in a dejected tone, but bringing a judicial attitude to bear, John smiled at Hedy and said, "Perhaps you're biased in your opinion of my ability. Maybe I'm not so hot after all!"

Hedy simply stared at John. "How long have you been in this business!" she demanded in astonishment. "I simply will not talk to you if you are going to say things like that. It's ridiculous. You know you have everything you need to be a big success in pictures. Don't say such a thing to me again. Not ever!"

Of such wifely partisanship is marriage made.

Somewhat later, Hedy said tentatively, "You should go to your agent and tell him that you want to do some radio work. You have the voice and the diction for it. Even though you might do only small shows at first, it would lead to something good. I'm sure of it."

So John went on sustainers and found that he liked radio work very much.

At the end of the two-month Warner waiting period, John returned to his studio with lifted eyebrows. A part? A new picture?

Because of one of those curious lulls that descends upon Hollywood occasionally, there was still no role in preparation for Mr. Loder. Mr. Warner agreed, reluctantly, to abrogate John's contract. Whereupon, John wrote a letter of appreciation to the Burbank Executive. In return, he received a note from Jack Warner which he will cherish forever. It is one of the friendliest of contract-termination missives.

"Now," said Hedy with wifely conviction, "you'll see that things will start happening."

The first thing that happened was the chance of a contract with MGM—Hedy's home lot. A contract that was turned down by the independent Mr. Loder. "Thank you very much. I appreciate the honor you have done me," he said, in effect, to the studio, "but I will not ride into a contract on the skirts of my wife."

And that ended that.

Within the next few weeks, John was signed as the Director of the radio "Silver Theatre" every Sunday night, and he was signed by Jules Levey to play "Lazar" in Eugene O'Neill's story, The Hairy Ape, which is being produced in film for the first time. The title role, incidentally, is being created by William Bendix.

"And so," John said to a group of friends one night, summing up his professional advancements, "in a year of marriage, my wife has urged me into a brand new career in radio, and into a revitalized career in pictures. No wonder I consider myself an exceptionally lucky man."

If Hedy has proved to be the dynamo in the furtherance of John's career, John has proved to be the balance wheel in their marriage. Hedy is one of the most mercurial of investors. Almost any salesman with a reasonably convincing manner and an oil-slick line can fascinate her with the aspects of whatever he happens to be selling.

Don't get the impression from that that Hedy isn't a good business woman, because she is. It is her very financial success that sometimes impels her to recklessness. That's when a husband is a valuable commodity.

After a year of matrimony, the Loders have grown reconciled to one another's foibles. In the morning, John lights his pipe upon awakening, and smokes it on his way to the bath. In the bathroom, he puts the pipe on Hedy's dressing table. Invariably he forgets the pipe and returns to his room to dress.

Hedy upon entering the bathroom, always picks up the pipe gingerly and transports it, to John's pipe stand, calling, "The place for your pipe is here, not my dressing table."

The following morning they go through the same routine. The beginning of a junior "Life With Father" tradition.

About the house, Hedy is scrupulously neat. Every ashtray has to be in its place, every picture must hold an even keel; every book must be in its particular spot on the bookshelf. But when she changes clothes she is inclined to drop a shoe here, a stocking there. Lingerie is likely to be draped over a chair, and a dress over the chaise longue.

John's house habits are lackadaisical; he is likely to have littered ashtrays in convenient rather than decorative spots. He wads pillows on which to rest his head, and a coffee table four feet out of formation annoys him not at all. However, about clothing he has the views of an inspecting general, his shoes are always placed on trees and lined up in proper rows. His suits are always brushed before being hung away at the end of a day. Ties are placed in a press, and shirts are relegated to the hamper.

Here is the twist that makes marriage such a wonderful institution: John's fastidious treatment of his clothing causes him to appreciate Hedy's meticulous attitude toward their house. And Hedy's casual viewpoint on the care and hanging of clothes makes her tolerant of John's offhand treatment of household goods.

The Loders continue to be enthusiastic givers of presents to one another. For Christmas Hedy gave John a wrist watch, the case of which is constructed in a woven gold design which matches his wedding ring. And, while they were in Mexico City last fall, John gave Hedy a gorgeous matching set of star-shaped amethyst-studded Mexican silver consisting of earrings, necklace, bracelet and ring.

The trip to Mexico, incidentally, was a second honeymoon. They stayed at The Reforma; they visited Xochimilco; they attended their first bull fight.

John had been eager to go, but Hedy had demurred. Yet, when a friend of John's who lives in Mexico City combined his persuasions with those of the impresario who arranged the arena programs, Hedy not only went, but occupied the box directly above the entrance to the ring, and had a bull dedicated to her.

Meanwhile it began to rain, so a gallant matador offered his cape to Hedy. Gratefully, she draped it over her head and shoulders.

After a series of passes and feints, the toreador killed the bull dedicated to Hedy and tossed up his hat in accordance with the grand tradition. Hedy caught it. From her wrist she unclasped her gold identification bracelet, placed it in the hat and returned it to the toreador; it was a great moment, colorful, romantic and exciting.

Some time later Hedy received a letter from the mother of the toreador saying that he had been gored in a subsequent fight but because of her bracelet which he wore always as a lucky charm, he feels his life was saved. He is now recovering nicely.

Of such is marriage made; shared careers, shared business ventures, shared household habits, and shared vacations.

Yet one small word is quite adequate to express the happiness of John and Hedy. Susan Hayward, working with John on The Hairy Ape, said one morning, "I haven't seen you at the Canteen on Friday night lately. How come?"

John explained that his radio rehearsal always occurred Friday night. "But," he amended with family pride, "I always take the wife down to the Canteen on my way to the broadcasting station. Then, when rehearsal is over, I pick her up." Very much the suburban husband speaking.

Susan howled. "To think that I should live to hear that glamorous, gorgeous creature referred to as the wife," she said.

It is now a gag. She asks John each morning "Well, how's the wife?"

"The finest in the world," is the contented rejoiner of the head of the house of Loder.

RATIONING (MGM) gets a lot more fun than you would imagine out of a subject that frets most Americans. Wallace Beery is the confused proprietor of a small-town general store, and the point system drives him nutty. There is a minor excursion into a black-market expose, but in to help Beery with the laughs are Marjorie Main, Donald Meek, Connie Gilchrist and Gloria Dickson.

CHIP OFF THE OLD BLOCK (Universal) gives Donald O'Connor and Peggy Ryan a light musical romp. Their co-star is the brightly promising 17-year-old Ann Blyth in her screen debut. She is a more talented young lady than her part in the back-stage comedy allows her to be. For another film debut, Quiz Kid Joel Kupperman bounces in for a couple of scenes and wins your heart just as he does on the radio.

THE BRIDGE OF SAN LUIS REY (United Artists) is a plodding, old-fashioned drama completely out of key with the present times. You doubtless remember the Thornton Wilder tragedy about the inter-related lives of five strangers who died in the crash of a bridge in Peru in 1772. Among the leading characters are Lynn Bari, Francis Lederer (playing a dual role), Akim Tamiroff, Nazimova, Louis Calhern and Blanche Yurka. They should have helped the shaky "Bridge" more than they do.

CURSE OF THE CAT PEOPLE (RKO) tries to follow the success of a picture that started a vogue for psychological horror stories. Kent Smith and Jane Randolph, the couple who found love despite the terrors visited upon them by a panther woman, now have a six-year-old daughter. She pals around with the spirit of Simone Simon who has been transformed into a kindly, sweet ghost. It all goes to prove that sleeping cats, like dogs, should be left to lie.

MY BEST GAL (Republic) is a small pleasantry which presents Jane Withers in her most grown-up role. The granddaughter of an ex-song-and-dance man, she has no stage ambitions and is content with her job in a drug store. But she does help Jimmy Lydon find a producer for a comedy he has written on the eve of his Army induction. Lydon is the boy with whom the growing Jane is in love, and Frank Craven is excellent as gramps.

CHARLIE CHAN IN THE SECRET SERVICE (Monogram) marks the return of Sidney Toler in the Earl Derr Biggers character that was dropped as a series by one studio, only to be picked up by another. The welcome resumption of the Chinese sleuth's movie cases finds him in Washington where he brings to justice the murderer of an inventor of a secret weapon against U-boats. Two of Chan's large family of children enter the plot in the persons of Marianne Quon and Benson Fong. Darn clever, these Chinese.

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

"COSMETIC CLOSE-UPS"

SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

It's nothing new under the sun to find that fuzz grows faster. Extra summer sunshine has a way of stimulating superfluous hair. As far as we know, creams and lotions have no effect on these unwanted hair cells. But Vitamin D has.

That's no reason to give up your sunbathing—not when there are so many ways of checking it.

Let's Face It: A light growth of facial hair functions to flatter. That's because this downy fluff gives a smooth, dull finish to the skin surface. Heavier, darker hair is something else again. For a mannish mustache or some startling sideburns, try peroxide and ammonia. Your druggist knows the proper percentage. Bleaching insufficient? Well, you can remove the hair with a rosinous wax (epilator). As the mixture hardens, it closes firmly over the hairy area. You lift the epilator off—and all superfluous hair comes with it.

Eyebrows and chin whiskers respond best to tweezing. This stiff, stranger hair can be plucked out painlessly as frequently as necessary.

Forearm Fuzz: Up in arms over that "sooty-sleeved" look? Then remember that hair bleach can mean any kind of hair—anyplace! The same preporotions that assist a blonde, help superfluous hair do the disappearing act. Or you can "erase" the hair with a special toilet abrasive. These come in pad or mitt form for easy handling.

Legs in the Limelight: So keep them sleek and shadow-less. A razor is quick and effective, but several other methods of hair removal are just as efficient and somewhat pleasanter. Epilators (those lift-off waxes) do a long-lasting job. Depilatories "dissolve" the hair by chemical action so it can be washed off with cool water. Erasers rub the growth right off. And bleaching makes fine, sparse hair practically unnoticeable.

How Long Will It Last? The only way to remove superfluous hair permanently is to have each hair root treated individually with an electric needle. This method is known as electrolysis. It takes time—and money—and it must be done by an expert. If you decide to submit to electrical treatment, be sure the hands that hold the needle are skillful and experienced.

Giving all your time all the time?

The greatest star of the screen!

No more stirring tribute to the dauntless British spirit has been written than the vivid lines of Alice Duer Miller's "The White Cliffs".

* * * *

In filming this living symbol of British heart and heroism, the Studio which produced the great "Mrs. Miniver" continues a tradition—making of "The White Cliffs of Dover" another great and important picture.

* * * *

This is magnificent MGM entertainment—but it is also a contribution to the hope of the future in the partnership of nations, especially those which share a common language.

* * * *

For it is a story of a way of life and shows how that way of life dovetails with the American Way.

* * * *

The canvas is large—the story is simple and personal. Centering around an American girl—played by the charming Irene Dunne—and the love she finds among the stately homes of Britain, in the person of Alan Marshal.

* * * *

Adventure, excitement, bravery, action and infinite tenderness are all woven into "The White Cliffs of Dover"...in the screen play by Claudine West, Jan Lustig and George Froeschel.

The cast of supporting players contains names that in themselves deserve supporting casts. Among them are...Roddy McDowall, Frank Morgan, Van Johnson, C. Aubrey Smith, Dame May Whitty and Gladys Cooper.

* * * *

Primary credit should go to Clarence Brown who gratified a strong ambition in planning and directing this production. He was admirably spurred on by the able cooperation of a man who has emerged as the screen's greatest producer, Sidney Franklin.

* * * *

Together, they have showered loving care on this new, momentous MGM enterprise.

* * * *

Just as "Mrs. Miniver" moved us, so will "The White Cliffs of Dover". A heart-warming reception is its sincere due.

EYES on the Stars FEET on the Ground

Polish to point up a pretty toe.

BY SHIRLEY COOK

BEAUTY EDITOR

A GIRL who ankles up the ladder of fame has to stand on her own feet. According to Gale Robbins whom you'll see in the 20th Century-Fox picture "In The Meantime, Darling," this is literal, not figurative fact.

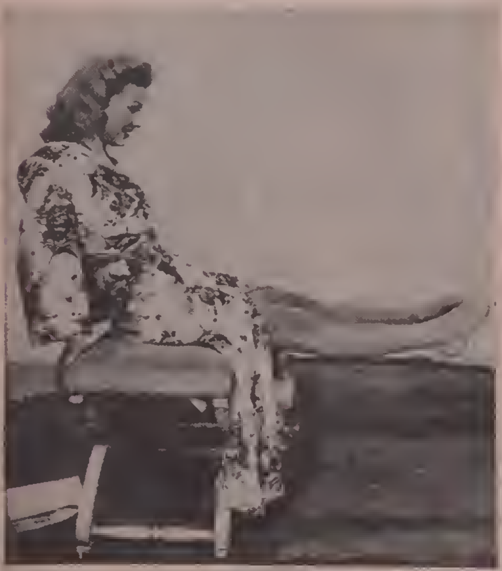
Movie methods require plenty of foot and leg work. And it's not all cheesecake! After you've stood and walked through a few miles of film, you learn the importance of flexible feet—and of legs that are sturdy as well as slim. The correct combination is care, comfort and camouflage.

Fit Feet. Before starting for the studio, Gale dusts her tootsies with antiseptic foot powder. Another film of powder keeps shoe linings fresh and sweet. After-work relaxation includes warm water washing and a brisk massage with special foot balm or lotion. Once a week or so, Gale varies the treatment and uses skin-softening hand lotion topped off with a dry skin cream rub.

Leg Lure. Legs get a lift—right over Gale's head—as she bicycles them to beauty. Fifteen minutes of exercise, each and every day, and nothing can undermine her underpinnings!

To slick the surface, Gale depends on soap and water and a stiff brush. Her regular hand lotion keeps the skin smooth and silky. Weekly workouts with face cream supplement sun-robbed natural oils.

Dress Parade. The final fixings are strictly for show. A complete pedicure (to groom cuticles and give nails shape and sparkle). And finally, leg make-up, stroked on evenly for "sheer" durable flattery.



A well-turned ankle needs daily exercise. Legs are held taut, ankles are turned in.

Final inspection to make sure legs are looking smooth, shapely, tinted to taste.

Cool and correct! Gale applies bronze-toned make-up to simulate her scarcer stockings.

NEWEST BABY

Happiest girl around town this month is Loretta Young who has just revealed the pleasant news that the stork will arrive at her house about August first.

Loretta hopes for a big family, and by that she doesn't mean just two or three. She means six or more. She grew up in a big family and she likes life that way, and since her marriage to Col. Tom Lewis is such an ideal one, her dream will probably be realized.

LAMENT FOR LULU BELLE

All that show-must-go-on routine has always seemed pretty silly to me when applied to movies, which after all can be shot another day. So this note is to tell you that Missy Colbert stayed home and wept her pretty eyes out and refused to so much as face a camera the day Lulu Belle died.

Lulu Belle, in case you don't know, was a toy French poodle that Claudette's husband, Lt. Commander Pressman, gave her four years ago and which had been the star's very small, black shadow ever since. Thus, with her husband serving overseas, Claudette felt heartbroken on that awful day that Lulu Belle got some bad food somewhere and couldn't recover. If you're a dog lover you know what the feeling is.

The only pleasant touch was the way practically all Hollywood tried to make it up to Claudette. There's no girl whose friends love her more and every one of them tried to do something. It remained for her brother to do the perfect thing, however.

He got another puppy, just Lulu Belle's breed, just as black, almost as cute and brought it around to Claudette's house, late afternoon.

That did it. Claudette began to smile and next morning was right back in front of that camera again, her chic sparkling self.

EDMOND O'BRIEN

SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

Add to the list of stars already departed, these new names: Red Skelton, Mickey Rooney and Corporal Alan Ladd.

Mickey was re-classified after having previously been listed as 4-F. Red was one of the hardest working comics, in the service of service men, in the whole movie colony, but he's long yearned for active service. The star on whom this decision falls hardest is Alan Ladd, who had once been discharged, honorably, for ill health.

It falls hard on Alan for just that reason. There happens to be an Army law that if a man is recalled, he goes in at his old rank. The very fact this law exists, proves that before this, men have been honorably released and then brought back into uniform again. But because Alan is a movie star, a certain amount of jealous whispering that is completely untrue has gone on. Alan has always wanted to take his place beside other fighting men. He still wants to, and this time, he hopes to get into active service.

One thing people don't know about Alan, usually, is that his terrific popularity has brought him almost no money. He went to Paramount at a ridiculously low salary and before he could reach the big income brackets, he entered service. Even for the picture he has made between these two service stretches, "And Now Tomorrow," he only got $7,500. That's a lot of money to people like you and me, but deduct 60% of that for taxes, divide it with a wife and two children, one of them new born, and it isn't much to carry on with until he gets back to grease paint again.

If time permits, Alan will finish "Two Years Before the Mast" before he dons those corporal's stripes again.

RICHEST GIRL

Edmond O'Brien playing a role in the New York Army Air Force show, "Winged Victory," attracted the attention of Doris Duke, the richest girl in the world, and now a divorcee. They became constant companions, until Nancy Kelly came to Broadway on a bond tour. Miss Kelly is the ex-Mrs. O'Brien. It wasn't a happy marriage, but it still looks as though Miss Kelly and Mr. O'Brien carry a torch for each other. Anyhow, they picked it up during Nancy's visit. The situation is intriguing the New York-Hollywood set.

LADY LET'S DANCE (Monogram) owes its position on any recommended list because of Belita, the dazzling ice skater who has become Monogram's brightest star. The story is a trifle about a refugee waitress from Holland who gains her start on the stage through becoming the discovery of a breezy hotel entertainment promoter, then can't locate the guy to thank him or tell him of her love until the final curtain is ready to be rung down. There is just enough of this Cinderella plot to serve as an excuse for the lavish musical numbers for which four orchestras are recruited headed by Henry Busse and Mitch Ayres. Through the proceedings, the lovely Belita has opportunity to match her known ability on blades with a further display of grace in ballet, ballroom and rhythm dancing. Therefore the title. It's strictly a one gal show, but what a gal!

UNCERTAIN GLORY (Warners) begins with the same situation that started a film we had last month called "The Impostor." A French murderer, condemned to be guillotined, escapes after the prison where he is being held is bombed. The development of the two stories is entirely different from that point. In "Uncertain Glory," the murderer is recaptured by a clever policeman and is on his way to being taken back to face his sentence. Then an act of sabotage is committed, the Nazis seize a hundred hostages, and the prisoner talks his captor into allowing him to confess to the sabotage that a hundred innocents may go free.

Errol Flynn performs the murderer, and Paul Lukas does the policeman for another personal hit. Very impressive in her promising film debut is Jean Sullivan, a 20-year-old former UCLA student. Lucille Watson, Faye Emerson and Sheldon Leonard are others of note in rather fanciful war melodrama. From its players, the picture gains all of the glory it has.

FOUR JILLS IN A JEEP (20th Century-Fox) is based on the actual experiences of Kay Francis, Carole Landis, Martha Raye and Mitzi Mayfair in their tour of military camps overseas, a tour that ended with their being under fire in North Africa. The four principals appear as themselves in the picture which deals more intimately with the entertainment of our men in service than does "Follow the Boys"—which is reviewed this issue on page 61. It is nonetheless a bright and entertaining show that benefits from the fact you know in advance that the trip is a fact. Kay, Carole, Martha and Mitzi really suffered discomforts on their tour. But they gloriously did the job they set out to do. And there were some romantic interludes for the "Four Jills in a Jeep."

John Harvey plays a character named Ted Warren who is the prototype of Capt. Tom Wallis whom Carole married in England. Dick Haymes, the radio singer, is introduced to films as the boy who was in an act with Mitzi before he went into the service. He has what it takes to make a place for himself on the screen and you'll be screen-hearing more of him. Guest appearances are made on Command Performance broadcasts by Alice Faye, Betty Grable, Carmen Miranda and George Jessel as m.c. And Jimmy Dorsey and his orchestra are on hand in England to supply the accompaniments for some four new tunes by Jimmy McHugh and Harold Adamson, all of them first rate. Be sure to hitch a ride with "Four Jills and a Jeep."

WORDS of MUSIC

BY JILL WARREN

HELLO, you individuals. What's doing in music these days? Ooops, sorry, I forgot—I'm supposed to tell you. Well—

THE TUNEFILMS:

When the movie companies start signing opera stars to do their stuff in screen musicals, you can be sure that swing is here to stay. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has contracted two of the biggest biggies of the Metropolitan, James Melton and Lauritz Melchior. Melton will be in "Ziegfeld Follies," and Melchior will warble in "Thrill Of A Romance." Melchior makes his first appearance on the Hollywood sound stages, but this is trip number two for Melton. Seven years ago he made a couple of pictures for Warners.

The "Follies" promises to be a real super-super. Ninety-nine and forty-four one hundredths percent of the film will be devoted to songs, skits, girls and numbers, with the balance left to "plot." The cast is composed of a few kids who ought to do fairly well in pictures—Lana Turner, Judy Garland, Fred Astaire, Lena Horne, a few name bands, and practically every star on the Metro lot thrown in. The thing has just gone into rehearsal and will take approximately a year to make. So if you're not too old to walk when it is released, try to catch it.

If you're a Bing Crosby fan, and who isn't, don't miss "Going My Way." It's one of the best pictures Bing has ever made. He plays a priest, but don't let that confuse you, for there is plenty of music in evidence. Bing's singing team includes Rise Stevens, Jean Heather and the Robert Mitchell Boychoir . . .

Charlie Spivak and his band, who did right well by themselves in their first picture, "Pin Up Girl," are the newest additions to Twentieth Century-Fox's "Something For The Boys." This is the opus in which Perry Como makes his first movie appearance.

Columbia's latest musical clambake is "Jam Session." And it's just about that. All kinds of bands, including Louis Armstrong, Alvino Rey, Teddy Powell, Glen Gray and Charlie Barnet, plus your old friends "The Pied Pipers."

Universal changed the title of "Three Cheers For The Boys" to Learn something about your War Bonds from this fellow!

THE BEST THING a bulldog does is HANG ON! Once he gets hold of something, it's mighty hard to make him let go!

And that's the lesson about War Bonds you can learn from him. Once you get hold of a War Bond, HANG ON TO IT for the full ten years of its life.

There are at least two very good reasons why you should do this. One is a patriotic reason . . . the other a personal reason.

You buy War Bonds because you know Uncle Sam needs money to fight this war. And you want to put some of your money into the fight. But . . . if you don't hang on to those War Bonds, your money isn't going to stay in the battle.

Another reason you buy War Bonds is because you want to set aside some money for your family's future and yours. No one knows just what's going to happen after the War. But the man with a fistful of War Bonds knows he'll have a roof over his head and 3 squares a day no matter what happens!

War Bonds pay you back $4 for every $3 in 10 years. But, if you don't hang on to your Bonds for the full ten years, you don't get the full face value, and . . . you won't have that money coming in later on when you may need it a lot worse than you need it today.

So buy War Bonds . . . more and more War Bonds. And then keep them. You will find that War Bonds are very good things to have . . . and to hold!

My Day with

FRANK SINATRA

by JILL WARREN

Behind the scenes with a regular guy with a winning smile and a grand sense of humor you know him as "The Voice"

IT'S no secret that for the last few months the subject of my story has been whispering over countless loudspeakers, with proper musical accompaniment, to Miss America and her brother the details of what makes "A Lovely Way To Spend An Evening". To hear him sing it, there's no doubt it's something wonderful. But you can take it from me, even a day with Frank Sinatra is not to be sneezed at. There is more truth than poetry in this observation, and I might as well tell you right here and now that the word sneeze is no mere figure of speech in the description of my day with Frank.

With humble apologies to the Chamber of Commerce and all loyal Californians, let it be recorded that there has never been so little sunshine and so much "unusual" weather in such a short space of time as there was the day I sallied forth to follow "The Voice" on its daily routine. California papers announced, with a mixture of surprise and resentment, that a storm of equal ferocity had not been recorded for many a year, probably back to the time when Frank Sinatra was still playing cops and robbers on the docks of New Jersey.

I was supposed to meet Frank at his apartment at eight o'clock. But, believe it or not, I overslept. Imagine any girl in her right mind not hearing the alarm clock when she has a date to spend a whole day with the nation's number one dream boy!

Sinatra lives at the Sunset Tower, a sky-high (for California), swanky building on Sunset Boulevard which overlooks the city below. He lives with Hank Senacola, his personal manager, in a six-room apartment on the sixth floor.

I hurled myself into my clothes and headed for this elegant rendezvous, but it was eight-thirty when I made it, and as I whipped my four-cylinder crate up to the doorway, there was Sinatra rushing RKO-wards in a job that was distinctly twelve more cylinders than mine.

I fled after him.

The fog-dampened studio cops at the RKO gate didn't seem to care too much this "bright" Monday morning whether I had a pass or not, but I did, and with little resistance they let me in to wade my way to Stage Eleven, where the Dream Boy was making his new picture. I entered the stage looking like I had come by way of the Pacific Ocean.

While the rest of Southern California was worrying and explaining about the showers, Frank was faintly collapsing on the side of the set, studying his lines for the day's first scene. He was really beat from the day before. His Sabbath had been spent rehearsing for the Lux Radio Theater during the day and doing a benefit at Earl Carroll's in the evening. But his only "beef" was that he hadn't had a chance to read the Sunday papers and find out, until early that morning, what gave with Buck Rogers and Superman.

Frank was draped around a canvas-backed director's chair on which was printed in large type "The Voice."

"This is the second one I've had," Frank explained. "Some visitors lifted the first one as a souvenir, so now the boys who made the original as a gag when I made 'Higher and Higher' tell me if this one disappears I'll be the voice without a back, because they won't give me another."

Somebody yelled from the background that coffee was ready. I tagged along while Frank had java and two cinnamon buns. I didn't think this was quite enough breakfast for a growing lad who was trying to gain weight. But he assured me that if I had appeared on time I would have known that this was really breakfast number three.

"I had prune juice and coffee when I woke up, and then after I dressed I put away orange juice, eggs, plenty of toast and jam, and coffee." He opened the coat of his gray tweed suit to show he had added a bit of flesh to the Sinatra body. "I weigh a solid one-thirty-six now. I feel swell except for a slight sore throat."

At that precise moment a tall, stunning, dark-haired girl appeared and handed Frank a small bottle of cough medicine. She is twenty-two-year-old Jerome O'Shea, pretty enough to be in pictures herself, and probably Frank intently rehearsing his songs for the Lux Radio Theatre with Lou Silvers and his orchestra.

"That's my dressing room over there—if I ever get a chance to get in it," Frank tells Jill Warren.

one of the most envied girls in America, because she is Frank's secretary. "The Voice" took the bottle and dutifully proceeded to lubricate his tonsils. Over his shoulder, like a fog-horn, came the booming blast of the assistant director's voice, "Come on, Frank, you're holding up production." Miss Tall and Dark, entirely unmoved by the assistant director's Hollywood wolf-whistle and stage whisper that followed, "Some secretary, Sinatra," calmly retrieved the bottle. Frank is no slouch when it comes to retorts. "Yeah," he replied, "and I've got a quick switch—I can sit on her lap."

The set was the foyer of a theater. There were pictures around the walls of Shakespeare, Tolstoy and other famous authors, in large gold frames. Frank was to walk around the foyer and stop and look at each picture. Then a little boy buzzed up to him and asked if he wanted a shine. The dialogue was played over for the business of the shine. It seemed ages before they got a good take. Each time something went wrong. Frank would forget and put his downstage foot on the shoe box, a light would blow out, the cameramen would have to reload, or Frank would fluff his lines, which happened more than anything else. This is only Sinatra's second picture, and it's natural that some scenes should be a little difficult. But his own dialogue, when he made a mistake, was funny enough to keep the crew from getting upset at the time (Continued on page 66)

Betty Grable, the joyous mother. Her infatuated love for Harry has grown since marriage into a love more intense, very lasting.

THE NIGHT BETTY'S BABY WAS BORN

BY DOROTHY MANNERS

EARLY that afternoon the torrential rain that had been drenching southern California for two weeks had stopped for an hour or two while the frustrated sun tried to get in a beam edgeways.

Betty and Harry James stood in the door of the pink-and-blue nursery looking for the 'steenth time at all the presents from the "shower" Virginia (Mrs. Daryll) Zanuck had given for her.

"Won't be long now until this room is completely furnished," Betty said, "IT will be here."

"You mean, he'll be here," said Harry. He had called it "he" from the start.

"Harry, you haven't really got your heart set on a boy, have you—I mean you won't be disappointed?"

"I'll accept a girl if she looks exactly like you," he kidded.

"Punkie," the James' spoiled, petted Poodle, came racing down the hall from Harry's room and barked jealously at the nursery door. Punkie had been jealous—and barking—ever since Betty had come home from the "shower," her arms loaded with white woolly toys and big, exciting boxes.

Over in a corner, all in place and ready, was the white lace-trimmed bassinet Lana Turner Crane had given them. (Betty had immediately put both a pink and blue satin bow on the bassinet so "It" wouldn't get its feelings hurt whichever it was!)

The pink-and-blue high chair that could be made

Harry James, the proud papa. He had to pace hospital corridors through two long nights before Betty's and his beautiful daughter was born.

Harry and Betty are shown opening their mail the day after they were married last July 5th. The famous couple always planned to name their first girl baby Victoria Elizabeth.

to slide up high or down low was from Alice Faye Harris. (Harry fooled with the mechanism so much Betty was sure he would break it before the baby could.)

Hanging in the blue wardrobe with the pink Storks was the cutest gift of all—a beautiful bed jacket for Betty and a miniature one, an exact replica, cut in a baby's size—from Virginia.

Outside the nursery the baby's sun porch faced onto the 100 orange, lemon and avacado trees in the front yard that hid the James' home from sightseers on the Coldwater Canyon road. The back view gave onto the swimming pool and the shady mountain.

It was a comfortable "homey" house that Harry James had bought for his bride, "done" in chintzes

Harry was playing at the Hollywood Palladium just before the blessed event. Betty stayed close to him, called the baby "it."

CONTINUED

Her legs are lyric, but they are not the only thing that has made Betty Grable box-office queen. Her good common sense has helped.

and mahogany—a house not for big Hollywood parties, but rambling, with unexpected wings, as if it had been built for a big family. It was a very private, very personal place to them.

They seldom even gave interviews at the house. After their front page elopement and midnight marriage in Las Vegas, last July 5th, they had met reporters at the studio, or at Betty's mother's home. When they had moved into their home they seldom gave interviews at all. The Jameses had moved off the front pages and settled down to domesticity with their hearts in it!

"Punkie" ruled the roost—and at the moment he was going mad trying to get either Betty or Harry to close the door on the hated "place."

"We're going to have to see that Punkie gets a formal introduction to the baby," said Betty, "He's going crazy being jealous of something he can't locate!"

Harry looked at his watch. "I have to hurry, Honey" (they never called one another "Mama" or "Pappy" or any other of the pre-blessed event terms). "It's time for my radio rehearsal—almost two o'clock."

"I'm going, too," she said. This had been one of the really swell things about the whole—waiting! They were together all the time. Ever since Betty had notified her studio that she was in "retirement" and ever since Harry finished his engagement at the Palladium, Hollywood's most deluxe and super favorite dance hall, they spent every hour, day and night, together.

Harry went to get the car. From the driveway he sounded the signal, two long, one short on the horn. But Betty didn't come out.

He yelled, "Ready?"

Maybe she couldn't hear him. When he went to see—she wasn't ready at all. Not to go to a radio rehearsal. She was lying on the divan, her long bobbed hair (the way he liked her to wear it) spread fan-shaped on a pillow.

"Betty! You feel all right?"

"Yesss. I guess so."

They looked at each other. A look of surprise, wonder, questioning crossed her face. But her voice was calm, Betty's old slightly kidding voice when she said: "I think, Harry—maybe you had better call the doctor."

That was 2:30 p.m.—the afternoon of March 1st. It was 4:30 a.m. the morning of March 3rd before Victoria Elizabeth James was born! Prematurely . . . one month too soon . . . the dangerous 8th month . . . in a Caesarian operation that almost cost Betty Grable's life.

In "woman's talk"—Betty James had a "hard time." The baby was large—seven pounds, ten ounces. Later, thinking back on it, the women remembered that Betty hadn't dieted. She had eaten and laughed at their hints and warnings. "I'm the healthiest person you know. I'm hungry—and besides, IT'S hungry!" As a matter of fact Betty has never dieted under any circumstances.

Like her close friend, Lana Turner Crane, she had refused to be a glamorous invalid. Right up to the very last she had gone every place with Harry. To his rehearsals, his broadcasts, to dinner and to the night spots.

It just wasn't in Betty to worry about herself. "Of course," she laughed one night in a poker game, "I do hope the baby isn't born with a deck of cards in its hands."

Betty and Harry and their close friend, May Sunday, and Lana and Steve Crane and two or three others, played cards almost every night. The Jameses usually won—which surprised Betty. She had never been much of a card holder. "Maybe (Continued on page 74)

BRAIN TEASING IN STAR-LAND . . .

The Game's the thing! Slap us happy, all Hollywood's playing it. These Sullavan party funtimers are champs at it. What is it? Grandma used to call it charades. The moderns call it Indications.

Host Barry Sullavan argue-votes with Betty Huttan regarding the "up" of "Upton Sinclair." What happens in the game is that two teams are chosen, each side tries to guess the other's pantomime, and the fastest guessing team wins. These two share low score.

Betsy (Mrs. Gene) Kelly was the best indicator on either team. She's a non-professional, but her acting gave the best cues. Don't judge by "Frenchman's Creek" Cordovo—he's no audience!

BRAIN TEASING IN STAR-LAND...

CONTINUED

There are romance rumors in Hollywood about Dorothy Gish and Louis Calhern. Here she's giving undivided attention to Eddie Bracken's pantomiming of "So Big."

Gene Kelly, Louis Calhern ("Life With Father"), Bill Carter and Eddie Bracken, stumped on the indicating of "You just know she wears them." Look wise, guys!

Kelly sneaks a cue from Tom Keating. Things like this aren't supposed to be allowed, but Gene was desperate. How can he figure out a sketch meaning "Bless your little heart, honey?"

Tain't funny to anyone but Betty. Barry guesses, but Mrs. Ronald Graham (she's Florence Sundstrom on the N. Y. stage) just can't get the hang of it.

Bracken does "Hold Back the Dawn," guessed as being "pushover," and "Pale Hands I Love." Catch on? It's just as goofy as it looks. Guaranteed to make you guess-sappy, but the stars say you'll love it.

Betty Hutton and Eddie Bracken do a sing-song silly to give a clue for "Sing a Song of Sixpence." It's the duo that twosomes in Paramount's mirthful "Miracle of Morgan's Creek." Serving it solid, that's what they were, while the crowd roared on. That's what "the game" does to 'em. Makes everybody sill-jill.

ALL the hope, the heartbreak, the glitter and sparkle of a fabulous community center on a cheap, rather ridiculous-looking gold leaf figure that wouldn't bring five dollars in the most sanguine Gifte Shoppe. Out of affection and respect, people in the motion picture business call this figure Oscar. The coating of gilt that makes Oscar shine for a while is thin, and the expression on Oscar's face is cryptic, to say the least. (Of course, before the war, Oscar was actually of gold and will be again, once peace is restored.)

But it isn't Oscar himself who counts. It is what Oscar symbolizes. Once a year Hollywood's house divided unites to do honor to its chosen great. Stars and property-men, producers and grips, extras and make-up men, secretaries, assistant directors, press-agents, script girls, cutters, character-women and directors have all said, with one mighty voice, that these two actors, these two actresses lead all others for one particular year.

For sixteen years, as a happy Hollywood bystander, I have wondered how it felt to be one of these glamorously chosen people. Thus this year, on the morning of March 3rd, to be exact, I journeyed forth to ask the distinguished four.

I chose to visit Jennifer Jones first. As you know, she won for her wonderful work in "The Song of Bernadette," for which the producer, David O. Selznick, chose and groomed her. Jennifer, just in her twenties, told me the thrilling excitement of that night was almost more than she could bear. She sat tense and quivering beside Selznick in that packed theatre. On his other side sat Ingrid Bergman, another very strong contender. A few seats away were Jean Arthur, Greer Garson and Joan Fontaine, all contenders and all seasoned actresses of great motion picture experience.

outstanding picture of the year, she began to relax a little. If the production she was in were not chosen, she couldn't believe she had much chance.

Then——

"For the outstanding performance by an actress in 1943——"

Greer Garson, the 1942 winner, tore open the sealed envelope just handed her and read, "Jennifer Jones!"

"It was like a dream," she told me. "I'd hoped, of course, and knew I had some chance. But I believed that Ingrid Bergman deserved it far more than I did. Why, she has taken parts not nearly as fine as Bernadette and has put so much into them that they became alive and vital and real!"

The day itself had been filled with simple domestic cares. Jennifer had just brought her two little boys home from a visit to her parents and had no nurse or maid to stay with them.

Besides, she wanted to be busy. She's been lonely since her separation from Bob Walker and the trip back home was a relief and a release. For a whole week she'd been just Phylis Isley again, of Tulsa, Oklahoma, being given luncheons and parties by the girls she'd gone to school with, showing off her babies and forgetting such things as prestige pictures, production schedules—and Oscars.

"On the way to the theatre," she said, "I suddenly remembered I'd forgotten to send on a chain-letter that had been in the mail when I got home. Well, I just knew then I was going to lose! But I touched the Lady of Lourdes medal I wear always and opened my purse and took out the Chinese paper money a boy I knew at school sent me for luck. After that I was sure again that everything would be all right. It just had to be, because the boy's a flier and had carried the money on all kinds of dangerous missions."

After the Academy there was a gala party at the Mocambo.

"The names of the winners were already printed in gold on the menus when we got there. It was wonderful!" she said happily. "Just everybody was there. I'd never been out before in Hollywood and I just couldn't look around enough. I was so afraid I'd miss someone or something. I just loved it!"

When it was all over, she went home to her two little boys, put Oscar under her pillow and fell into a dreamless sleep.

All this, as you can see, is a "young" reaction, but Paul Lukas' was romantic.

Paul Lukas got the Award as best actor for his performance in Warners' "Watch on the Rhine." When he was called to New York to do the part on the stage, the breaks had been decidedly against him in Hollywood. But to call his position now a "come-back" is a mistake, for he was just as good five or seven years ago when no one would give him a chance.

"I wanted to win so much that it is almost impossible to express in words my hope that I would," he said. "When I was nominated, I told myself, 'That, at least, is one step forward.'

"Then I began to be afraid that some of those who voted might not like the subject of the play—that it might be distastefully politically. I did not sleep for three or four nights before the Award. I could eat nothing.

"To make it worse, I had had 'flu' for ten days before and went to the theatre that night ill and with a temperature. But I felt that I must go—particularly if I do not win. For then people might say I was a bad loser.

"So Daisy—my dear wife of seventeen short years—and I sat there, trying to look calm and, well not too concerned. It was like waiting in the ante-chamber of the room where they keep the electric chair.

"Because the honor of an 'Oscar' is a very real thing. It is not only the the bread-and-butter the actor eats, but the very oxygen he breathes. Professors are given awards for outstanding achievements in education; surgeons for achievements in medicine. The Academy's citation can mean just as much to the actor.

"In spite of all my hopes, though, I was taken aback when my name was called. (Continued on page 64)

"THE trouble with you is that you expend too much energy on people who don't really interest you, who can't actually mean anything to you! You scatter your interest and your energy all over the place and it's wasted. If you would learn to direct it and concentrate it, you could accomplish so much!"

"Listen to Dr. Sothern! She always knows what's wrong with you and she knows the answer. I must say she's usually right, too. She'll prescribe for a broken heart or an infected sinus. She knows what to do about a bad case of sniffles and she knows a lot about a bad case of disappointment. She can nearly always help."

The foregoing, as you may have gathered, was a conversation during which Ann Sothern had been advising a friend about a current problem. The comment, from a bystander who is fond of Ann, speaks for itself. It's true.

Ann has one of the broadest maternal streaks in Loretta Young found out that she didn't know a good antique even when it was given to her.

Joan Crawford, herself a shining example of self-improvement, is forever "improving" her friends.

Their EXPRESSED DESIRES

Nothing suppressed about movie stars. When they're not acting they express themselves in a dozen different and goofy ways

Hollywood and it expresses itself by Ann's prescribing for anything which seems to ail anyone whom she likes. It isn't an academic reaction, either. She means it. And her offers of assistance are practical, genuinely friendly and earthy.

When a friend announced that he was going to the hospital for a minor operation on his throat, she inquired instantly, "Shall I go with you? I know it's easier, sometimes, to have someone who isn't family. Families make such an ado. I could go along and stay until you came out of the anaesthetic. I'd be a sort of familiar face. And then if you wanted any errands done, or any messages sent, I could attend to them."

Anyone in trouble or anyone with a worry is interesting to Ann. She diagnoses them and tries sincerely and oftentimes successfully to help. "She's missed her vocation," someone said of her. "If she hadn't gotten into pictures, she'd probably be a one-woman, all-purpose clinic by now. And she'd be good at it!"

Nearly every successful person has a hidden talent or a suppressed one or a yearning (sometimes a shamefaced one) to be doing something entirely different from the thing at which he has succeeded. Some of these are funny and some of them are wistful; some are useful or amusing, or just plain incongruous. A good psychoanalyst could tell you what these things mean. I can't. But I can tell you about some of them.

Take Barbara Stanwyck. Barbara is convinced that she can, by now, qualify as a fairly expert dance instructor on all the latest steps. This is a surprise to Barbara herself. It came about because Bob Taylor didn't like to dance very well. Not only that, but he was sure that he wasn't good at it. Barbara said that was nonsense. He had a sense of rhythm and he'd be fine at it, if he would only try.

Came the evening, not very long before Bob went into the service, when Barbara felt that she must have a little dancing in her life. Bob demurred and stalled and finally, with what he thought was great good humor, and not meaning a word of it, suggested, "Why don't you call Central Casting and get a partner?"

Barbara rejoined, "A swell idea!" And she did just that.

Presently a nice looking, but slightly bemused, young man was on the Taylor doorstep and the next thing he knew, he and Barbara were prancing and twirling like crazy to victrola music in the living room, while Bob applauded—a mite wistfully.

That didn't last long, though. (Barbara isn't dumb.) Next thing Bob was being shown some steps, and pretty soon he was doing the twirling—while the professional young man applauded. (The latter was still bemused. Can you imagine being paid to spend an evening dancing with Barbara, in her own house?)

Anyhow, Barbara took up the lessons from there, and in no time people were noticing Bob's improvement and eager souls were enticing Barbara into quiet corners at parties to get her to show them "just that very difficult little twist . . . the one Bob does so well."

"I flatter myself," says Bob's wife, "that I'm pretty hot stuff when I make with the dancing instruction. If pictures ever let me down, I'll know what I can do."

Claudette Colbert would have been an important executive, if she hadn't been a fine actress and (on second thought) if she hadn't been so beautiful. She

There is a Hollywood group who yearn to write. Another group yearns to sing. Jim Brown yodels.

Nicest, most worthy off-screen project, born from bitter experience, is John Garfield's.

"manages" naturally, and gracefully. If it's a dinner party and the group is going on to a theater afterward, it's Claudette who says briskly, "I think it's time to get our coats now. Let's see. We'll take two cars, and if one leaves five minutes before the other, the first one can unload and reserve parking space for the second. That will save time later, because they'll be parked together. And if some of us want to go dancing and the others don't, we shan't be cluttered up with trying to get part of us home and part to a nightclub." And so on. No one could possibly arrange it more neatly than Claudette. And certainly no one around her is going to try.

She always manages to make everyone feel that the evening has been an especially smooth one, and your being in the party has produced this delightful effect. You're never aware, unless you concentrate, that she has been running things. They just seem to develop. It's a valuable knack.

Joan Crawford diagnoses you, too. But only if she knows you very well and is really fond of you. You can assume that you have really been taken to the Crawford heart if Joan leans back, slants her eyes at you and remarks, thoughtfully, "Y'know, I think that if the lapels on that coat were an inch wider they would really do something for you!" Or, "If your hairline were a little bit higher and your lips emphasized with a color—just a shade lighter—you'd bring out those wonderful cheekbones of yours. Why don't you try it?"

But just give one of those boys or girls his head where his pet and latent talent is concerned, and see what happens to you! When the Jack Carsons bought a new house, Mrs. C. asked Jane Wyman for a little advice about buying things for it, because she thought Jane had done such a grand job with her own. So Jane offered to go up to the Carsons'. And she did, too—although they were explaining a little wildly that they hadn't really bought anything yet, just a chair here and a stool there.

"When I got home later," Jack relates, "Jane had moved every stick of our sparse furniture. She had put everything where it hadn't been before. And darned if it didn't look better. Even the room that had just two chairs and a coffee table. She'd grouped 'em or something! Jane can make furniture say 'Uncle!' "

A lot of actors seem to have ideas, some of them good, about interior decorating. A few are real collectors and know their stuff. Experts will tell you, for instance, that Loretta Young has a real eye for good furniture and a way with her when it comes to arranging it. But Loretta tells this on herself.

Her mother gave her a particularly valuable French Provincial book case. Loretta (Continued on page 81)

The delightful story of Charles Coburn who won the 1943 Academy Award for his supporting role in "The More the Merrier."

Master Charles Coburn, tintyped at the solemn age of seventeen. Note that neckwear department!

CHARLES COBURN

The old Savannah Theater, where Coburn started as a messenger boy and ended up as boy manager. (Some kid, eh Charlie?)

Not a glamour boy, but perhaps the finest example of how to succeed when you're not! His latest picture, "My Kingdom for a Cook."

IS REALLY A Character

BY DOROTHY DEERE

RECENTLY, in that epic of bedlam-and-bath titled "The More The Merrier," Mr. Charles Coburn brashly gave out with a statement that could be used to start a debate that would range all the way from Catherine the Great to Eleanor Roosevelt.

"Young lady," said Mr. Coburn to Jean Arthur, "it has been my experience that there are two kinds of people. Those who don't do what they want to do—so they write down in a diary what they haven't done. And those who haven't time to write about doing things, because they're out doing them."

Let that statement stand unchallenged as an introductory note to the story of Charles Coburn himself. In all his crowded life, Mr. Coburn has never kept a diary. He has always done things. The thing he is busiest doing at this moment is revising the movie makers' idea of box-office.

Box-office up till now has been largely a matter of heart-throbs like the hard hitting Gable, Taylor and Ladd; heart-stimulants like Hayworth, Grable and Lana Turner; or even heart-aches like Spencer Tracy and Bette Davis. All of these, you will note, have been reasonably young and photogenic.

Not until the deluge of fan mail that followed "The More The Merrier" did anyone realize something new had been added to this "heart" business. Not a twitch, not a tingle, not a thump—but a Dingle! Most amazing, this new kind of a tremor had nothing to do with glamour or sex, but was the special property of Mr. Coburn who, you will agree, would never be picked as a pin-up boy by either the WACS or the WAVES.

"Dingle," you may remember, started out to be a character in "The More The Merrier," but became instead a sort of rascally charm pervading the whole picture. "Dingle," naturally, was impersonated by our hero, Mr. Coburn, himself.

In essence, the "Dingle" is a kind of inner laughter which wraps itself around the affections of women both young and old, and causes them to characterize Mr. Coburn as "cute." In practice, it is probably the most comfortable attribute owned by any actor on the screen. Its possessor can let his waist line roam where it may and let his most arduous muscular feat be that of keeping his monocle in place. Consider the glamour boys who, behind closed doors, clandestinely glue their hair pieces on. Then consider the peace of Mr. Coburn, who during the making of a recent picture, happily walked the lots with his thinning tresses curled by bobby pins and held in place by a pale blue snood!

Charles Coburn and "Mr. Dingle" were fated to meet and merge ever since the beginning of his career. He has been rehearsing for the role, you might say, since the age of 13, when he pushed his way into professional life in the same opportunist manner employed by Dingle to enter the apartment of Jean Arthur in "The More, the Merrier.".

Destiny, says Mr. Coburn, got him his first job.

It happened in Savannah, Georgia, where surprisingly this English mannered actor was born. He tells it thus:

"One matinee afternoon I arrived a little tardy at the Savannah Theater, prepared to buy a ticket to the gallery. A large crowd was massed solidly against the theater door, which was constructed to open outwardly and which, at the moment I arrived, was being shaken from within. Someone inside the theater was making mighty efforts to open the door, a few inches at least.

"I wormed my way as near the front of the crowd as possible. Finally the door opened, just enough to let a man's head appear through the opening. He looked at me—I looked at him—and our souls clicked.

" 'Young man,' he called, 'do you know where Robinson's Printing Shop is?'

" 'Yes, sir!' I answered, most eagerly.

" 'Then run down there and get the programs for the performance. Hurry, we are waiting!' "

Mr. Coburn contends the sidewalks of Savannah still bear a slight scorch mark along the route his feet travelled to get those programs that day. He distributed them when he came back, and for that saw the show free. From that day on he practically glued himself to the theater, and soon graduated to the position of an usher and the conviction that the place couldn't run without him.

He was evidently right, for at the age of seventeen, Charles took over the management and was publicized as the youngest house manager in the United States.

This eminence, naturally, convinced him that he was an authority on things histrionic. As a mere tot he had been taken by his mother to see such "greats" as Joseph Jefferson, Richard Mansfield, E. H. Sothern, Otis Skinner and Minnie Maddern, who afterwards became Mrs. Fiske.

"As long as I could remember I had thought of the theater as the royal court, the palace, the home of grace and beauty and chivalry, the field of heroism—peopled by kings, queens, courtiers, knights—with romance and human character exhibited at its noblest and most majestic. Now, in my capacity as manager of one of the most important houses on (Continued on page 87)

Maria Montez

1944 is apt to be an emotionally upsetting year for lovely Maria Montez whose Sun is in the sign Gemini, but it is also for her great advancement and to establish her permanently among the screen's unforgettables.

Her Moon is in the sign Sagittarius, opposing her Sun, and producing a temperament torn between restlessness and excitability which helps her waste much of her excellent energy in unwise enthusiasms.

Her natal Mars, Mercury and Jupiter conjunct in Taurus, gives Maria stability with the urge, even the necessity of financial security and ease. This also produces her fierce determination to achieve her ambitions at whatever personal cost. The squaring of these three planets with her natal Uranus in Aquarius presents difficulties through friends and partners when carrying on to her goal demands what might seem a self-centered attitude.

Saturn in Cancer has taught the necessity of curbing her warm affectionate nature which naturally loves society and companionship. The fiery Montez has had to learn a middle path between caution and generosity, friendliness and a natural suspicious nature. Maria (Continued on page 60)

HOROSCOPES

Gemini

For persons born between May 21 and June 22

After all the mystifying setbacks of 1943, you have realized that impatience and mistrust breed only confusion and unhappiness. People born under this sign are over-sensitive where friends, and relatives and their affections are concerned. But the past year should have brought you understanding of your own strength and importance to them. With this power of influence over others you are important to the world. Guard this power. With it you should be well on the way to finding, at last, a definite goal.

The passing of Saturn, Uranus and Mars through your natal Sun sign have helped you to grow up, even though it has been the hard way. Life cannot be all fun, and one must have a deeper motive than curiosity to understand it and get the most out of the adventure of daily living.

For Gemini people security seems to lie close to home in 1944, and home can never provide irksome duties unless you allow those duties to irk you. You may be able to do exactly the things you desire this year. Remember sacrifice of freedom is sometimes necessary, for that freedom may be for your own growth. After July, responsibilities will be much easier, and property troubles or confusing issues should clear up.

The path of romance is not clear as you demand only the best. Gemini people are not practical in affairs of the heart For their own happiness it would be wiser if they were a bit more so.

Lady Korda graphically describes one wonderful way to help heal our wounded boys brought back from the front lines of war

I FOUND courage in a hospital ward, and I found a war work that every woman can do. It takes no money to do this work, no beauty, no talent. All it takes is time and a generous heart. It is because I hope I can persuade every woman to do this work, for whatever number of hours per week she can spare, that I am writing this article.

It wasn't my own courage that I found in a hospital ward, for I had none.

It was their courage—row on row of them, lying quiet and patient and still alive. Boys from Pearl Harbor; boys from Guadalcanal; boys from the Hornet and some from Attu and North Africa and Sicily and Italy.

What I did was such a simple thing. It appeared to be so easy when it first occurred to me and was so quickly arranged. I only wanted to walk around the wards where the wounded were and talk with the boys a little while. When I called the Victory Committee for permission, they said it would be quite all right and set a day and time when I was not working at the studio.

It was only when this hospital visit was all arranged that I began to have doubts. What did I have to offer those boys? I had no patter of jokes, no little songs to sing that would make them laugh and forget for a moment the burden of what had happened to them.

I actually had nothing planned. My only thought wa to stop beside a boy's bed and talk with him.

When the hour of my first visit came and I stood i the doorway of the ward, I was in a state of panic suc as I have never known before or since.

There, looking at me across the room, was a pair o eyes that symbolized the spirit of the whole place—eye so alive, so glowing, so eager that my heart caught in my throat and I had to turn away for a moment to find strength to go on. For the eyes were the only part of that suffering boy not bandaged.

A nurse whispered how very ill he was—that it was almost impossible to graft skin on the completely burned surface of his body. Yet there he was, so very brave. He had every reason to have abandoned hope and bravery, but his courage surged up and flowed into my heart in such a mighty flood that I felt at once humble and proud.

I just started to talk about whatever came into head. I was shy, really, and those boys were shy. were pitiful, but I saw at once that pity wasn't what wanted. They just wanted to talk—about anyth So talk we did. They read a lot, and so intellige They are extremely well-informed. They follow pol with the greatest interest and (Continued on page

HOLLYWOOD

THE men go hatless, but the ladies of Hollywood are definitely hat-happy. Their humor goes to their heads, and nothing picks a glamour girl up more than a perky brim, shielding one eye.

Hollywood abounds with hat shops and private hat designers, but the place to go for an alluring lid is still John-Frederics in Beverly Hills. Every smart girl in town turns up there eventually, and many of them haunt the place a good three days a week.

The five greatest hat buyers in movieland are Joan Crawford, Irene Manning, Claudette Colbert, Loretta Young and Ginger Rogers, about in that order, with Roz Russell a hot sixth.

Crawford goes in for high colors and big brims. The government is cutting in on her a bit, with its restrictions against extra-large size headgear, but nothing can stop Joan from adding veils, scarfs dotted with jet and sequins, and bits of lace and nonsense scattered here and there. With her terrific dramatic flair, she gets beautifully away with it all. The glamorous Crawford also has oodles of tricky hair ornaments, flowers and many varieties of head draperies for evening wear.

Colbert, the conservative but ultra-chic, accents her head wardrobe with small hats which do not interfere with her hair style. She also likes intricate small hair do-dads. Claudette probably spends more on hats and gets less for her money than any star in Hollywood. That's because she wears only tiny chapeaux for the very short time they are super-fashionable. She is perfectly capable of whipping up her own small toppers, and often does.

Irene Manning couldn't tell you to save her why hats are a matter of necessity to her, but if she's to be happy she has to have beautiful headwear. Like Crawford, she prefers large hats, the bigger the more alluring, but she buys all types, and adores them all.

Loretta Young buys pretty hats with a touch of flattering color or veiling, but artful in their simplicity. No one need tell Loretta what is becoming to her. She knows to the tiniest detail.

Ginger Rogers is a passionate hat lover. She has a yen for tricky designs and all sorts of trims. She won't wear a hat that doesn't stay firmly on under all circumstances. When she tries on a hat, she dances around in it. If it sticks despite the wildest waltz or rhumba, the hat is hers. Ginger like brilliant colors and because she's pretty much of a tailored person off screen, she chooses many tailored hats. She's seldom the first girl out with the latest fashion, for she wears her new hats late in each season. She dotes on being jaunty in a light colored straw in mid-winter. She's absolutely insane on the subject of snoods and wears them so deep that they dangle to the middle of her back, and the pet Hollywood crack is that she must fill them with old fan mail since no one since the Seven Sutherland Sisters has had hair enough to fill such snoods.

GREER GARSON is a pushover for greens, chartreuse and "shocking" shades, but Olivia de Havilland chooses a great deal of pink, and like Ann Sothern, specializes in "pretty" styles. Ann, in private life as in her Maisie pictures, is a wow in off-the-face types. Ann has scores of hats in different colors, but all are designed to reveal her rounded features and smooth brow. Norma Shearer, once she finds a hat that does something for her, has twelve or fifteen of the same model whipped up in as many colors. Her opposite is Maria Montez. Maria simply dotes on fussy and fancy fashions with plenty of color and an abundance of feathers.

When Marlene Dietrich shops these days she has a practical plan in mind. Her hats usually fits close to the head, but are tricky and eye catching. She wears her fanciest bonnets when she's going to army camps, for no matter how much fun they make of women's fashions, the boys love hats with allure.

Lana Turner, who makes up her mind quickly, has a hat enthusiast for a husband. Steve Crane buys surprise hats for Lana. This spring Lana is topping her costumes with a red creation made like a Valentine. It was built like a heart, being her Valentine gift from Steve.

Ray Milland is mad about hats, and the saucier the better. He buys them, all unassisted, for his beautiful wife Mal, who fortunately thinks they're just as swell as Ray does.

A little bird's nest concoction has been gracing the head of Judy Garland this season, and it's all in blue with pastel accents in bird feathers. Judy always goes for feathers.

Irene, that fashion genius at MGM, is rabid on the subject of hats. She says, "You might as well go without a skirt as go without a hat. You are equally as undressed either way." She agrees with most of the smart girls in Hollywood that a hat finishes a costume, and she wouldn't venture to the corner for a sarsaparilla without headgear. Edith Head, Paramount's pride and joy in the fashion department, is equally enthusiastic about hats, and she can't resist buying them. She feels they are an important part of her wardrobe. But Edith never wears all the hats she buys. She carries them. Oh yes, she carries the right ones to match her suit or complement her dress . . . but she doesn't put them on. They complete her costume all right, but clutched in her very active fingers.

Bette Davis, though, doesn't even make that pretense. She hates hats. That's all there is to it. She won't wear them off screen, and that's that.

Movieland's lovely Esther Williams is shown surrounded by chic bonnets—the very breath of Spring.

Jinx Falkenburg

The newest bride and groom of Hollywood, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Scott—and don't they make a handsome couple! They were in love for two years. They parted six months ago . . . but now, well, read this story.

THE DRAMA BEHIND
RANDOLPH SCOTT'S Marriage

WE were just getting ready to fold up and leave for the day when the tip came in that Randolph Scott was being married in Riverside, Calif., to "Pat" Stillman.

If we hurried the call through, we might be able to reach the bride and groom for a statement before they left the office of Judge R. A. Moore.

The Best Secretary I Know, and I, took off our hats and coats, picked up a telephone apiece and started what usually turns out to be a timeless job. Trying to get hold of movie actors who have just married is like trying to get a statement out of a mirage.

The "happy couple" have usually just left—or have not yet arrived—or won't talk even if they happen to be on hand.

The call went through to Riverside—to Judge Moore's office, and you could have knocked me over with anything handy when Randy got on the phone when asked for.

"Congratulations, Randy," I said, after giving my name.

"Thanks," said Randy in a drawl. He's played so many Westerns and cowboy parts he sounds like one even though he is far from being the genuine article. Randy? He's a So'thern gentleman, from Virginia, ma'am—and one of the best families.

After a few pleasantries were exchanged I asked: "What's the bride wearing, Randy?"

"Wearing? Oh!" A slight pause, as though, man fashion, he had turned around to take a look.

"Sort of a suit," he described helplessly. "I guess."

"What color?"

Another pause. Another look. Then, "Beige—I guess. Pretty, though."

"Are you happy, Randy?"

"Happy?" he laughed. "There's a question I can really answer. I was never happier in my life!"

There could be no doubt about that. You had only to hear his voice to know that. (Continued on page 84)

In the romance of one of Hollywood's most social actors and the beautiful San Francisco heiress there lies an amazing story

BY MARSHA DENTON

JINX—She is the most decorative member of the famous Falkenburg family of tennis terrors. Her real name is Eugenia but no one has ever called her that yet. She was born in Barcelona, Spain, speaks Spanish like a native, but grew up in and around Los Angeles. Under contract to Columbia, she is still to find the role that does full justice to her talents. Her latest is "Cover Girl."

If you were Shirley Temple

EXPLAINING WHAT IT'S LIKE TO BE SWEET SIXTEEN, AN EX-CHILD STAR—AND A BEAUTIFULLY BUDDING DRAMATIC ACTRESS

BY JANE REID

If you were Shirley, you would be very interested in your studies, and you'd work on your lessons in a little study room right off your bedroom.

A little Pekinese named Ching II would look very much like the original Ching a fan gave you and whom you once adored when you were a baby star.

IF you were Shirley Temple, you wouldn't think it a bit remarkable. It wouldn't seem strange, or even worthy of note, that you had been a movie star for eleven full years.

But that's natural. You got used to being a star just about the time most little girls were getting used to bands on their teeth. And you took it just as calmly.

If you were Shirley Temple, today, you'd be glad you had your sixteenth birthday in April but you really wouldn't be able to see why there was all the fuss about it. After all, you would think quietly to yourself, everyone has to be sixteen some time or another.

And you'd remember back, not even ruefully now, because you're the kind of a girl who takes life pretty much as it comes, to the time you found you had lost a whole year. That was your—you had supposed—12th birthday. Only Moms had waked you early with the news that it was really your 13th birthday because the studio had held out on you eight years before, and sworn your mother to secrecy. But she, being the sort of an understanding mother she is, knew that getting into the 'teens is a Moment in a girl's life—and she told the truth to give you the Moment you deserved.

So no other birthday will ever seem important again, except maybe your thirtieth—as that's a landmark in every woman's life!

If you were Shirley Temple, you'd be proud every time you overhear people say, "What a wonderful woman and mother Mrs. Temple must be—to have raised Shirley not to be a prime movie-brat!" And you might wonder a little what being a brat would be like—and if it would be any fun.

You would be growing up gracefully and improving your studious mind. You'd find nice manners second nature. You'd been troined to them from childhood.

You'd be talented, schooled in dancing and music, and you could sit down at the big grand piano and play classical or hot music. Your portrait as a four-year-old star would hang directly overhead.

Shirley Temple CONTINUED

But you wouldn't be conceited because people ask for your autograph, and stare at you and whisper, "Why, there's Shirley Temple", because they've been doing that ever since you can remember. And if you never knew any other reactions, how could such behavior seem anything but normal, anyway!

But if you were Shirley Temple, you'd feel a little sorry for your escorts, especially the ones who never faced a flash bulb at a big premiere. You wouldn't even blink any more when they snapped cameras and burst lights in front of you, but you would feel for the boy with you as he squirmed and looked away.

And you'd laugh at him, and tell him not to mind, not bothering to explain that you had worked out a philosophy which included the flash bulbs. They are all a part of the game, the working game of being a Hollywood character and an actress, and the minute they stop flashing, and people stop asking for autographs, then the actress is slipping. And better think of a new career.

But you have that all worked out, too, in that sharp little mind of yours. If the public doesn't like you in this last picture of yours—when you play Claudette Colbert's daughter, the screen sister of Jennifer Jones, and the child of a father who has gone off to war, in "Since You Went Away"—then you will go on to college with the rest of your class at Westlake.

But you really hope the public does like you. You like acting. You like taking direction, and working out a character, and playing it on the screen. So, you've got your fingers crossed—but you're not frightened of the future.

In fact, you've never been frightened of anything—even bugs. Moms laughs when anyone asks if Shirley was ever scared of anything. You just never were—and you think maybe you've had a lot of luck.

If you were Shirley Temple, you'd live in a biggish, sprawling French Provincial stone house in Brentwood, where you had lived for some years. And you'd love the smell of acacia in the springtime, and the cut-grass scents, and the look of the wild garden—planned to look unplanned.

It would seem quite natural to you to know that there was a whole room full of dolls downstairs. And that two wardrobes held every costume you ever wore in a picture. Where other little girls kept a couple of tattered dolls, you have several thousand, all because the fans showered them on you. And, where the mothers of other little girls treasured a single baby shoe and had it cast in metal, your mother kept whole wardrobes—because she liked to be able to remember all the pictures you made—and how cute you were.

But you never go down there and look at the dolls—there are too many other things to do, too many things to think about. And, anyway, you're not a backward-glancing girl.

If you were Shirley Temple, your best friend would be your stand-in, the same one you had the year after you started in pictures, Mary Lou Islib. And you'd go off into gales of giggles with her that grown-ups could never understand. But you know and Mary Lou knows, and who cares about the others?

And you'd have some pretty definite ideas about love and marriage, if you were Shirley Temple. Like the annoyance you feel when any of the columns come forth with little notes, usually wrong, about whom you are dating and who's calling you long distance. You feel that you ought to have some privacy, and you'd be a little embarrassed for the boys, and worry what their mothers think, and feel perhaps that being in the public eye was just a little bit of a disadvantage—for you as a girl with dates!

And so, because you'd never say that out loud, you would just announce when faced with that old love-question (which seems the first one to pop up in interviews now that you are sixteen) that you expected to be over twenty before you thought of marriage. Yes, and when you did get married, you intended to have children—several of them. And would you stop making pictures—well, that would depend on your husband's notions and yours, when the time comes.

If you were Shirley Temple, you would be interested in clothes, but you would dress very simply. You would like formals and the feel of long skirts swishing around your ankles, but you would agree with the rest of your friends that formals are not patriotic with a war on, so you would wear the ones you owned before the war. You would, because you would be a Junior at Westlake, wear a white cotton uniform at school and a blue cardigan over it on your way back and forth to school.

(And most of this year you would have had all your lessons on the set at the studio where you were making "Since You Went Away" because you were in practically every scene of the picture from the time it began in September to mid-February. And your teacher would have been the same one you used to have as a little, little girl! And your marks would be good—an average of B plus.)

You would wear very little jewelry, except lapel ornaments and that gold ring, with the sapphire and the tiny heart tags on it—about which you are very mysterious indeed.

You would be very feminine, and you'd take a big interest in fashions. You'd never waste a moment. You'd fill idle time with needlework or cooking.

You would know how to do your own hair, set it yourself, and you would experiment with it in new styles, drying with your own, most professional dryer.

You would wear very light lipstick, and not much of it, and pale, colorless polish on your fingernails.

If you were Shirley Temple, you would spend most of your time at home in your own small den beside your bedroom. And there is the desk where you do your homework, with the radio blasting away. All the older people have been yipping at you for years to find out how you study with that racket going on—but you do, and so do all your contemporaries, and all you can think is the older generation missed out by not getting used to radios early.

And in the desk drawer would be a store of chewing gum, which you hoard a little because you have a sweet tooth and try to curb it where candy is concerned. It's the gum your brother Jack brought you from the PX, where he is stationed, as a Sergeant in the Army Air Corps. Your brother George is the one who enlisted in the Marine Corps before the war and was in Pearl Harbor when the Japs attacked (you don't like to remember that unhappy time until you heard he was safe) and now he's stationed in the Mojave desert.

In your den, too, are all the books that bring forth so many comments from visitors. They don't believe you read them all, but you do—the serious war books and the light, kid stuff too.

If you were Shirley Temple, you would have just experienced a disappointment. Your brother Jack eloped (with family permission) and that did you out of a chance to be in a wedding. Then, the other day, you were invited to your first wedding. It was Kim Hunter's and you were very excited. But the two mothers did not cry—and somehow that seemed very sad to you. And so you cried for them—just a little, one solitary tear creeping out between your lashes. And your boss, David O. Selznick, who was sitting in front of you, turned around and patted you—and you felt a little silly.

And there was no champagne. You weren't sure if you would have been offered a glass, had there been any—but the chocolate ice cream soda seemed an anti-climax. Anyone knows there should be champagne at weddings!

If you were Shirley Temple, you'd be very popular on sets and at school, and even at home. You wouldn't have any of that dreaded "temperament." And your only close friends would know that you are very polite indeed when you don't like someone and that the ones you like, you tease unmercifully. It's a mark of favoritism with you when that almost rapier wit is turned toward anyone nearby. But that poise of yours never seems to be shakeable and you've answered so many questions in your much-interviewed past that there isn't a question today that you can't answer or parry with the skill of anyone many, many years your senior.

If you were Shirley Temple, you'd be five-feet-one-and-a-half-inches tall—and you'd insist on the half-inch being remembered. You'd still have the famous dimples; and a complexion that is the envy of everyone who sees you. Red would be your favorite color and you would be studying singing. Also you would experiment with salad dressings when a kitchen-mood hit you. And you wouldn't jitterbug; preferring soft, dreamy music and slow, smooth dancing.

If you were Shirley Temple, you would have a great capacity for work; would get a lot of fun out of life and look it. And you wouldn't want to be anyone but yourself—though perhaps, once in a very great while, you might vaguely consider how it would feel to be Betty Nobody. But you wouldn't waste much time thinking about that possibility, because you'd be much too busy growing up to be an even bigger movie star!

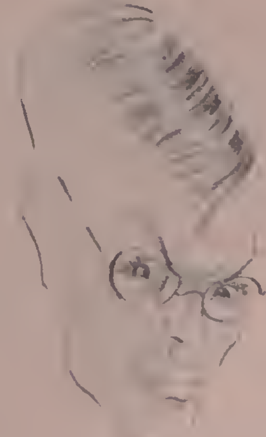
MOVIELAND'S

FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH



BY JACK GRANT

MARK TWAIN

(Warner Bros.)

ACCOMPLISHING a humanized biography on the screen is no small trick in movie-making. The Warners are experienced in bringing to film life such men of exciting scientific achievements as Pasteur and Dr. Ehrlich. It remained to be seen whether as much could be done for a literary character like Samuel Langhorne Clemens, who wrote under the pen name of Mark Twain. The answer is an unforgettable picture which vividly demonstrates that another aspect of our great nation's story can be told through imperishable records of the love, laughter and tears of humble folk.

Clemens' life began in 1835 with the appearance of Halley's Comet. In 1910 he died as the Comet again emblazoned the skies. During the years between, the wit and humor of Mark Twain brightened the earth for his fellow human beings. His creation of Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn are traceable to his boyhood on the Mississippi. His "Celebrated Jumping Frog" was born of adventures in the gold rush.

Fredric March's impersonation of Mark Twain is the finest performance of his brilliant career. As Olivia, the woman he loved for years before their meeting and marriage, Alexis Smith comes charmingly into her own as a topflight actress. The rest of the characters are incidental although they number important personages of the period. For warm, delightful entertainment, don't miss this.

THE WHITE CLIFFS

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

THE effect upon women who sacrificed their loved ones to the horror of today's war is magnificently depicted in "The White Cliffs," which was inspired by Alice Duer Miller's eloquent poem of the same name. Inasmuch as the stirring emotional drama was produced by Sidney Franklin, who sponsored "Mrs. Miniver," you will naturally compare the two. They are tastefully fashioned of the same valiant cloth and bound in the traditions that have brought England deserved respect and esteem.

Irene Dunne, in a most memorable portrayal, appears as an American girl who is courted and won by an Englishman. He is Sir John Ashwood and his young wife has difficulties in adapting herself to British customs. The year is 1914 and, shortly after their marriage, he goes away to give his life in World War I. His son grows up to follow in his father's footsteps. The boy is a casualty of World War II. As he dies, his mother is left to pray for a "good peace—a peace that will stick—for God will never forgive us, neither in England nor in America, if we again break faith with our dead."

The English-speaking races have never been closer than they are today, and pictures of this calibre will solidify that understanding. In support of Irene Dunne's beautifully sensitive performance, Alan Marshal gives a splendid portrayal of Sir John. There are priceless characterizations by Roddy McDowall, Frank Morgan, C. Aubrey Smith and Dame May Whitty.

GOING MY WAY

(Paramount)

THIS is the inspired entertainment in which Bing Crosby departs from the crooner's road to undertake the role of a Roman Catholic priest. Bing draws a superbly honest character with rollicking good humor and heart warming fidelity. His intimates call this priest "Father Chuck" and he shows the true precepts of a religion he preaches by joyously living it. He is a choirmaster who teaches his boys to sing "Three Blind Mice" before they learn "Silent Night," a sympathetic curate who withholds the information that he has been sent to take charge of the parish and replace the lovable old Father Fitzgibbon.

Barry Fitzgerald is wonderful as Father Fitzgibbon, a gruff stubbornly aging gentleman to whom the modern methods of "Chuck" are a trial. But St. Dominic's is a heavily mortgaged church in a New York neighborhood that no longer supports it. And "Chuck" has been charged with lifting that mortgage. How he achieves the task comprises a story that is a sheer delight, presented with rare delicacy under the direction of Leo McCarey, who is also credited with the original idea. "Going My Way" is a picture you will have to see or you will miss out on many discussions of cherished memories of its exquisite merits.

Music is effortlessly introduced by making Bing an amateur song writer and bringing in Rise Stevens to enact a star of the Metropolitan Opera, who helps him sell his songs. The youths he teaches to sing are played by the Robert Mitchell Boy choir.

BUFFALO BILL

(20th Century-Fox)

HEY, fellers, Injuns! Breathes there a man with youth so dead that he cannot remember the joys of playing cowboys and Indians. Today the boys of America are more taken with the exploits of Commandos and Marine Raiders. Yet the stories of the noble redmen offer thrilling chapters of Americana that will never be dimmed. And here in the saga of Buffalo Bill Cody, the most famous Indian fighter of history, is one of the very best of them all.

Naturally there is an air of excitement in any well-made tale of the Old West. This "Buffalo Bill" is a freehand portrait of the frontiersman in all of his strength and his weakness. At the start of the film, Cody is a scout at an Army post. He rescues the beautiful Louisa, daughter of a visiting senator, and after she traps him into an admission of love, they are married. Eastern "sportsmen" invade the West to shoot buffalo from passenger trains and bring about an Indian war. In a magnificent hand-to-hand battle at Hat Creek, the uprising is put down and Bill personally obtains the scalp of Yellow Hand, the Cheyenne chief. But his reputation is besmirched by the hunting powers he has offended, and much drama results.

Joel McCrea is swell as the picturesque Cody, Maureen O'Hara lovely as his wife, and Linda Darnell an interesting Indian girl. Also worthy are Thomas Mitchell as the fellow who wrote dime novels about Buffalo Bill, Edgar Buchanan as an old sergeant, and Anthony Quinn as the honorable antagonist, Yellow Hand.

FOLLOW THE BOYS

(Universal)

AT long last here's a picture that will give the general public some idea of the vast Hollywood volunteer enterprises which constitute the story of "soldiers in greasepaint," naturally not all of the story, but as much as could be told by more than fifty stars of screen, stage, radio and nightclubs. "Follow the Boys" is almost documentary in showing the mobilizations of talent to entertain our armed services at home and abroad.

George Raft plays an ex-vaudevillian who marries a filmland dancing star portrayed by Vera Zorina. In his character, Raft becomes one of the most active members of the Hollywood Victory Committee.

That brings us to Jeanette MacDonald singing for wounded men in an Irish hospital, Dinah Shore broadcasting around the world on the Command Performance programs, Orson Welles and Marlene Dietrich making with magic in a tent show, and W. C. Fields doing his billiard-table routine. At USO camp appearances, near and far, the diversity of talent runs from Artur Rubenstein, the concert pianist, to The Andrews Sisters; from Sophie Tucker's "Some of These Days" to Carmen Amaya's Gypsy troupe. The specialty you see Donald O'Connor and Peggy Ryan performing happened exactly as it is filmed. Equally true is the reenactment of what Martha O'Driscoll did to entertain the boys on her recent trip to the Aleutians. You must see "Follow the Boys" for your own morale, and for sheer fun.

YOUR PROBLEM and

BY Bonita Granville

Here's happy Bonita—Bun to her chums—leaving Movieland's offices with her first pile of letters from you to her.

CONVERSATION PIECE

Dear Miss Granville:

I am a girl who will soon be eighteen and people say I am pretty, but I am shy and suffer from an inferiority complex. Especially with boys. I have had very few dates and each one was awful for me to go through. Somehow I don't seem to be able to talk and can't find things to talk about.

My education is average, and I know conventional subjects to talk about, but they never seem to fit into what the others are talking about.

I want to have a good time, but somehow I don't seem to fit, and I don't want to miss the "teen age" fun. It seems I will if something isn't done about me soon. Can you help me?

Sincerely,
Madeleine

Dear Madeleine:

I well remember when I felt just like you do, and sometimes even now that same old feeling still happens to me.

I am eternally grateful for the advice given me by my mother on this subject. It has worked out beautifully and which I hope will help you too.

Mother carefully explained to me that an "inferiority complex" was the sign of a selfish and lazy person. She said that to meet people and to have them like you meant you must make a tremendous effort to please them. She told me how to be a good listener. This isn't easy, for you must be able to listen intelligently and to be able to ask the right questions. To be able to ask the right questions means you must be well informed on the subject under discussion.

I know a "date" is a very important thing to every girl. However, remember when you go on a date that you are going for mutual fun and your pleasant reaction to the happenings of the evening are your way of showing the young man you are happy in his company.

If you are natural in your reactions to things going on about you, you will have a good time and so will your companions. Try harder, be more natural, and if you don't know everything they are talking about, ask a few questions. Remember, everyone likes to be an authority. Work at being a friend and I am sure you will find your "inferiority complex" and shyness will vanish.

Cordially,
Bonita

FRIENDS TOO CAREFUL

Dear Bonita:

I am a girl suffering from infantile paralysis. The disease left me with one leg shorter than the other and my left arm is not as mobile as it used to be. I am luckier than most people who get this dread disease, for I can take care of the leg problem with built-up shoes and no one notices my arm too much.

However, I do have a problem. It is one of pity. Everyone is especially careful around me not to call attention to my infirmities. It is very embarrassing for I would not notice them myself except that everyone is always making a special and noticeable effort not to notice them, which really does call attention to my trouble. Thus I find myself not wanting to go out and meet new people.

My family do everything to try to make things easier for me at home, and I am perfectly capable of doing my share, but when I try, I suddenly find myself sitting down and being waited on. I don't want to hurt people's feelings for they are trying to be kind, but they are more of a hindrance than a help.

What would you suggest that I do.

Sincerely,
Marie P.

Dear Marie:

Your attitude is to be admired and I am sure you can work out your problem yourself. If I can help you in this letter I shall be happy and hope you will let me hear from you again.

I would talk frankly to my family about their desire to help you and explain your wishes more thoroughly. Don't let them make a cripple of you. Your fine spirit proves that you are not.

Another thing I would suggest is that you find some charitable work. Perhaps you could answer the phone at a USO or Red Cross, anything that will get you out of the house and meeting people who will help you be more independent. I feel that your outside activity will give you the freedom from the hindering help of sympathetic people.

My kindest wishes to you.

Cordially,
Bonita

PEOPLE ARE TALKING

Dear Bun:

I am sixteen and have a problem to ask you about. I have been going out a lot for the last six months, and people are beginning to talk about me.

You see I neck with the boys. Nothing bad really—just kissing. I don't see any harm in it. It really doesn't mean a thing and I can't see why people think it is so terrible. After all what is the harm of giving a boy a couple of kisses after you have had a nice evening with him? I think you should show him that you had a good time and then he will ask you to go out again. My girl friend thinks I am a fast stepper and I tell her she is wrong. What do you think?

Yours truly,
Geraldine

Dear Geraldine:

I think there is no harm in kissing a fellow you like very much However, I do think it is right to be choosey whom you kiss. Remember, you may like another fellow tomorrow, and another the next day, and your life will become a kissing bee unless you watch out.

I always believe that a man places a woman on a pedestal. It is the woman who climbs down, not the man who drags her down. Men are meticulous creatures and like their women to be fine, pure and clean. It has been this way since the world began. Who are we to change it?

Goody-goody girls are dull, but a nice natural girl who is a good companion is what the boys really want. I am afraid if you go on kissing all the boys you will find that they kiss you and take the other girls out. Save your kisses for your nice future husband and learn meanwhile to be a companion to boys.

Sincerely,
Bonita

LOVELY SKIN

Dear Bonita:

I am having skin trouble. Your skin on the screen and in your pictures in the magazines looks lovely and I thought you might have some beauty secret that keeps it that way.

My skin seems to break out all the time and I have blackheads that are very embarrassing and unsightly.

This is the treatment I have been using: I never use anything on my face but cream. Each night I remove my make-up carefully with a liquid cream and lots of face tissues. Then I use an astringent lotion to get the grease off. My face was worse when I used soap and water so I went back to the cream.

Now I have to wear a heavy make-up base to cover up the sores on my face, but the bumps still show. I know you use lots of make-up when you work in pictures. How do you keep your skin so nice?

Sincerely,
Caroline H.

Dear Caroline:

I sympathize with you. Your problem can be solved if you learn to take care of your skin properly.

It seems to me you are having basic trouble. First you should wash your face with mild toilet soap and warm—not hot—water. This should be done morning and night and thoroughly. Then rinse your face with cold water to help close the pores. Bumps and blemishes are almost always the result of over-oily skin; stay away from lubricating creams and lotions.

You might find it beneficial to omit face make-up occasionally and get lots of sun and fresh air. If you are using make-up, remember that cake or liquid powder is excellent for oily skin. Of course there are special "concealing" creams, heavy, opaque and tinted, that will cover obvious blemishes. For a month go on a diet of just proper foods, lots of vegetables, lean meats, fruit and milk. No pastries or sweets. Drink lots of water. If you really do this I am sure your face will clear up, but I know of no other method that will help.

If you continue to take good care of you—and your skin—I am sure you will get results. However, if you are actually suffering from acne, you should consult a skin specialist.

I hope I have helped you.

MINE

If you are in your teens or early twenties, you have a problem. It may be a big one, involving love, sickness or marriage, war loneliness or even an injury. It may be a small one, one concerning make-up, or how to dress, or how to wear your hair. But certainly being young, you have a problem, because youth never has quite time enough to work everything satisfactorily, as some times age does.

Whatever your problem, Bonita Granville is here, using the pages of Movieland to help you. Bonita, as you know, is a wise, attractive young thing, who faces many of your same problems and who solves them intelligently.

FIRST INTERVIEW

Dear Miss Granville:

I am graduating from high school this year. I'm a commercial student, and I am going to look for a job. With the shortage of good office help I am sure I can get a salary of thirty dollars a week instead of starting at the usual eighteen-fifty.

One thing that worries me though, is how to apply for a job. I just don't seem to be able to bring myself to even apply. There are so many dos and don'ts in the instructions our teacher gave us that I am scared.

Another thing, I am not as pretty as most of the girls and I am sure that I will have a handicap in that. What do you do when you go to interview for a job in pictures?

Sincerely,
Caroline H.

Dear Caroline:

The foremost thing you must remember is that you are looking for a job, not going out on a social occasion. Your future employer is looking for efficient help in his firm, not for a pretty dinner companion.

You should dress simply and nicely, have your hair dressed in a becoming and plain manner, and conduct yourself quietly and efficiently.

State your experience or schooling simply, tell the truth about your ability and be objective in your statements. Rather than say, "I type well, but my shorthand is only 100" simply tell him your typing is excellent and your dictation is 100. Leave out the "only."

A trick I have, when I am nervous on a job interview is to take a deep breath as I enter the room. It seems to give me a confidence. I remember, too, that I am applying for the job, not the boss.

Lots of us are not as pretty as other girls but by taking advantage of our best features and having a reasonably pleasant nature, we get along. Everyone can't be a raving tearing beauty and lots of other things count much more, so stop worrying about your appearance.

Yours truly,
Bonita

BETTER LETTERS

Dear Bonita:

This may seem strange to you but I want to know how to write a good letter. Most of my friends are overseas and I try to write to them all the time but I don't get answers from them. My girl friends get replies and I know it is because I don't know how to write a proper letter. I have read your answers in Movieland to the letters sent in to you and they seem to hit the point, so perhaps you could tell me what is wrong with my letter writing. Enclosed is a letter that I wrote to a boy overseas. What is wrong with it? I think my problem is one that many other girls have and maybe you can help us.

Thank you sincerely.

Mary R.

Dear Mary:

The trick on a good letter is to be interested in your subject. In a friendly letter you should write as you talk. If you talk well then your letter will be interesting.

Don't write letters unless you really feel the urge. Write with a sense of humor and with your mind on the things that will interest the person who is going to receive it.

It seems to me when you write to boys overseas, you should tell them what has been happening at home. Write the things that are cheerful and forget the sad or unpleasant things that are going on. Try to be breezy and interesting.

Your enclosed letter was a good one, but a bit stilted. The next time you write make believe you are talking. You'll find that a big help.

Write often. The boys overseas need the letters.

Yours truly,
Bonita

WANTS TO HELP

Dear Bonita:

My name is Ralph and I am ten years old. I wondered if you knew of anything that I and the boys in my gang could do this summer vacation to help the war effort. My mother says we can't go away on vacation this year but that we must stay home because of the war.

I thought you might know of something that little boys could do. We may be little in age but we are strong enough and big enough to do something that would help the war and keep us busy and maybe even earn some money.

Could you think of something we could do?

RALPH AND THE GANG

Hello Ralph:

You sound like the boy who lives down the street from us. He had your problem and this is how he solved it. He has been collecting paper for the scrap drive. He helps with his school collecting and then does work with the neighborhood group.

He told me the other day that he was working hard on his arithmetic so he could work in the grocery store this summer helping in the vegetable stand. He is going to run errands and do lots of things this summer that the older boys have done before.

Talk to your mother. Perhaps she will have some suggestions, or perhaps your daddy may be able to tell you what you should do. Discuss this with them, and I am sure they will be able to tell you what you can do.

My love to you,
Bonita

instinctively would love to share all she possesses with any friend. With those few who have not exploited her trust and who have seen through her quick temper and not taken it seriously Maria gives complete queen's devotion.

This is a period of abrupt change for Maria. Through the tragedies of others (probably some of this is her loneliness for her husband, Pierre Aumont, now serving with the Free French) she has found new understanding, acquired new vision and planned a new goal. After May 1944 things will be vastly different for Maria since she herself will be a different person with a wider comprehension of the realities of living. Late summer will bring more meaning to domesticity to her and her time will be happily spent there. One possible thing may prevent this. The needs of others can induce her to make a journey. This may be an event as impersonal as a War Bond Tour.

If Maria will advance beyond petty jealousies and studio difficulties, 1944 can be one of her best years. Deeper demands on her abilities as an actress and greater and more interesting roles will be Maria's. There is every indication that she will make clever use of her opportunities. Success lies in her hands, but while she has a swift grasp of events, she must have time to make up her mind definitely. Therefore, while Maria may hesitate, she must remember to control whatever instability of thought and action she feels left over from the entanglements of 1943.

The transitting planets throughout the year hold the dominant will, cause much to be demanded of her both as a star and as a woman, by her public. She should come through with brilliance and achieve a depth of character which will astonish her fondest fans.

NEWS ABOUT
BING CROSBY
DINAH SHORE
SONNY TUFTS
JOAN CRAWFORD

ASSORTED STYLE QUEENS

Joan Crawford tells this story on herself and I love it.

One of our most deluxe dressmakers is the very amusing Howard Greer, who is also an honorable gent who doesn't like to sell too many copies of his exclusive gowns to too many rival queens.

Joan had bought his newest bare-midriff gown, a very sophisticated number for a very sophisticated lady.

A week later, Howard called to say another star wanted a copy of the gown and was it all right if he sold it.

Joan asked who was the star.

"Shirley Temple," said Howard.

Joan said go ahead, but she can't wait until she and Miss Temple walk into the same room somewhere wearing that same dress. She wants to watch the men's faces.

AH, THE PAIN OF IT

We've told you before that Sonny Tufts and his wife lived in an auto court for months before they found a house. But then came the problem of the telephone. Sonny says he used to think that being a movie star could work wonders with anything. But the Telephone Episode changed his mind.

Mister Tufts asked the phone company to make an installation. They were sorry, but no. Then he wheedled, then he coaxed, then he went to Buddy DeSylva, Paramount head. Mr. DeSylva tried, and the telephone company was still sorry, but no.

One day the Tufts had a carpenter doing some repair work around the house, and Sonny mentioned his telephone problem.

"I'll fix that, bud," said the carpenter. "Don't you worry. I'll speak to my girl friend."

The next day the Tufts had a telephone.

The carpenters girl friend works for the telephone company.

CATCHING UP ON CROSBY

The thing about Bing is that he doesn't tell everything he knows. He wants to make a bond tour, but the powers in Washington have too much on hand for him to do right in Hollywood. But what doesn't get into print are things like these:

There are many, many times when Bing takes an unauthorized trip to the hospitals. He just drops in and sings for the wounded boys. More money goes from Bing's pocket for charity than even Bing has counted. No cash paid for sacred songs sung by Bing goes into the Crosby bank account. That money goes to the church. And as for helping the other fellows—well, at one time when Sinatra was just another singer, Frankie was singing at a radio station next door to Paramount. He had a friend by the name of Crosby who boosted Sinatra into the Paramount lot where Sinatra got some jobs for awhile.

BLISSFUL WEEKS

Before George Montgomery was transferred to duty in Texas, he and his lovely bride, Dinah Shore, spent three blissful weeks hunting antiques for their new tiny house they had purchased. Now Dinah is hanging the curtains by herself. Her letters to George contain snapshots of the progress of the house and his to her are filled with suggestions as to things he would like. One thing she has dutifully done. She has planted six rows of onions in the victory garden. They are George's favorite food. Incidentally, Dinah is a really superb cook.

NEWS ABOUT
CARY GRANT
CLARK GABLE
CRAIG REYNOLDS

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

SPECIAL INGREDIENT

You've no doubt noticed that men in professional or private life who are killers with the ladies usually go over like a lead balloon with the men. There are exactly two gents in Hollywood who are exceptions. The first is Captain Clark Gable who, with all the ladies charmed to a frenzy, still gets an enthusiastic okay from all the men. The other notable is Cary Grant. On a set at RKO just recently, I watched the whole crew drop their work and give Cary the handshake. It's a special ingredient that can't be put into words. Gable and Grant have it.

Incidentally, when Gable had to visit Paramount the other day, in connection with the war films he is making, every girl in the place left her work. They lined up across the lot to see Vitamin G. Clark just grinned and saluted.

PURPLE HEART FOR HERO

There's a very handsome star that you saw up until four years ago as one of the top-notchers at Warner Bros., Craig Reynolds by name. Before we went into war he could see the war clouds forming and enlisted in the Marines to do his bit.

He had a lot of tough times. He was in the original landing on Guadalcanal. He worked his way up from the ranks, from Pfc. to First Lieutenant. Then he got too close to a bomb. Today he wears the Purple Heart, the good conduct stripes and two Presidential Citations.

Today, with his leg in a brace, he's been honorably discharged, and has just signed a seven-year contract with RKO.

While he was recuperating in Navy hospitals, he put his story down on paper—double spaced. A book titled "I Came Back" by Craig Reynolds is the result. Craig is now hoping to sell the picture rights to RKO and hopes to play the lead himself. Now that he is a civilian again, now that he has a new pretty wife (Barbara Pepper), now that there's enough food and rest and no fear of bombs bursting around him, he looks back on the days when he never expected to feel American life again, and says, "It's all like a dream. It's funny, but I can't believe this normal life is mine."

Those love birds again, John Loder and the gorgeous Hedy Lamarr. They always beam on one another as they're doing here.

Lana Turner and Steve Crane were all smiles when this picture was snapped, but that was before Lana announced separation.

Spring had nothing to do with this love affair. It's the happy Brian Donlevys. They have already progressed to a family.

Still more Hollywood love birds, those sophisticates Joan Crawford and Phil Terry. Note Crawford's new hair-do. Isn't it chic?

LETTERS TO HER HUSBAND

Ginger Rogers writes a diary which any magazine would give their eye teeth to get. It is assembled once a week and sent to her husband, Jack Briggs, in the South Pacific.

Ginger clips together lots of pages of V-mail and carries them in her purse, and whenever she has a moment she adds a sentence or two. Jack wrote her one week and said everything sounded very interesting and it was like a serial, and by the way, pages four and seven hadn't arrived yet and he wondered what had happened to the people Ginger had been writing about.

Ginger is proudly showing a snapshot of Jack taken on duty. He is sprouting a mustache and looking very dapper. Ginger prefers him plain-shaven, but he threatens to come home with a full beard.

SMALL FRY FLURRY

The sub-deb darling of all Hollywood right now is Margaret O'Brien, out at M-G-M. With her "Lost Angel" knocking the box-office gay, young Margaret is getting the real star treatment.

The other day a very pretty girl came calling on her set. Margaret, like any other child about a studio, is accustomed to very pretty girls, so she barely glanced up at this particularly sweet one. Her director introduced them, Miss Sixteen-Year-Old to Miss Less-Than-Six.

"Margaret," said Director Clarence Brown, "this is Shirley Temple."

Margaret said how-do-you-do and that was that. She was too young to have heard of Shirley.

The following day, remembering the Temple episode, no one expected the small bombshell that hit the place when a pale, thin young man appeared.

Margaret rushed over to her mother. "Oh, why didn't you tell me?" she demanded. "Here I am, with my old dress on, and Frank Sinatra comes calling!"

LETTER CATCHES UP

When players go overseas they are given an APO just like any member of the armed services. Traced through an APO number, Ray Milland caught up with John Wayne in New Caledonia. That same day Ray received a V-mail letter from Jimmy Cagney, somewhere in the European theater of war. Jimmy's letter contained diagram for dance routine for Ray, which Jimmy hadn't had time in Hollywood to map out for

GEE WHIZ DEPARTMENT

Deanna Durbin is becoming, or determined to become the town's fashion plate. Recently at the Howard Greer dress opening, she ordered thirty-eight complete changes, then marched across the street to the Kenneth Hopkins hat show and ordered twenty-eight hats to go with them.

ACADEMY AWARDS

My wife has two brothers, one fighting, unfortunately, in the Hungarian Army, but the other with the United States in the South Pacific. So, as I stood up, she whispered, 'Say hello to Joe.'

"And when I made my speech, I felt I must thank Miss Hellman, who wrote the play, and Mr. Shumlin, the producer who gave me the opportunity of being in it. For, as you know, the play's the thing and good parts make good actors.

"Daisy and I stayed awhile at the Mocambo party and then went home and talked until four in the morning. We discussed our years together—all that had happened—and how far I had come from the little village in Hungary where I was born.

"We talked, too, about a place to put Oscar and decided, in the fullness of the moment, that the apartment where we live is not good enough for him. We would have to build a fine house for him.

"Then, as this led into a discussion of how many bathrooms and where and how big a living-room and how elaborate a play-room and how grand a swimming-pool he would need, Oscar gradually assumed the proportions of a monster, so we sensibly decided to put him up on the mantel in the modest and very comfortable place where we are now."

To Charles Coburn went the greatly deserved Award for the best performance by an actor in a supporting role. (See page 40 for more details on Mr. Colburn.)

"I really was surprised," the jovial Charles said. "As a matter of fact, I didn't think too much about it beforehand. I was up for it another year and because of my disappointment then, I was prepared to lose this time. That other time, though, my regret was much tempered by the fact that I lost the honor to that very fine actor, Donald Crisp. Had I lost it to a bad actor, I would have felt very much worse.

"So when Jack Benny called my name, I was startled. I had prepared no speech and must admit butterflies were fluttering around inside me on my way up to the stage.

"But I was saved by the jokes Jack had been making about his picture, "George Washington Slept Here," which he thought should have won the Award. Of course, as a running gag, no one he talked to had even seen the picture, but, luckily I had—because I was in it. So I managed some joking reference and ended up with 'After fifty years of service in the theatre, from program-boy to this——' "

Mr. Coburn looked around the sunny, spacious, cheerful apartment where he has lived since he came to Hollywood from the stage six years ago. On the walls are pictures of the theatre's great people who are his friends, and in his library big scrapbooks of clippings and records of the stage. There is an honored place being prepared for Oscar in this room. He will stand between a framed Master of Letters degree awarded Mr. Coburn by Union College and a citation from the Government for his efforts and help in entertaining servicemen in this great War.

Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens. He's out of uniform now, and they're still engaged. Marriage for this happy couple will wait until Craig's career is established however.

"I am extremely serious about the honor the Academy and my fellow-workers have bestowed on me," he said. "The art of the theatre is ephemeral, but the art of the screen is permanent. It is a definite, preservable record that may be seen and re-seen, to be judged on its merits as it stands.

"I only wish——" he paused and his eyes reddened with quick tears," that Mrs. Coburn might have shared this happiness with me."

His spontaneous and sincere tribute to the splendid woman who shared his life and career for so many years and whose passing has left an emptiness that no honor or success can fill, was touching and tender. It made me feel as if I had unwittingly walked into a very private and treasured room.

In awarding Katina Paxinou the honor for the best supporting actress, America again proves her great heart and genuine fairness. For Miss Paxinou is a refugee from Greece and her portrayal of Pilar in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" was her first appearance on the screen in this country.

When we met at Paramount she was carrying Oscar in a brown paper sack. He and she were going to have their pictures taken together.

"How do I feel about it?" she repeated my question gaily. "Why should I tell you a beeg lie? I am threeled—threeled to the very inside of me! And why should I tell you a beeg lie about what I did the day of the Award? Should I tell you I read or knitted an afghan or crocheted a doily? No, I weel not. I weel tell you the truth: I spent the entire day in the beauty parlor getting lovely! Of course.

"And my dress I had designed by Adrian. It is of the color of Pilar's dress, but it is draped in the Greek fashion. And all that day I could not eat. I could not rest. The day was s-o-o long—and so short. I kept whispering my leetle speech—just in case, eef, eef I get the Award, you understand—over and over by the clock to see eef it took the thirty seconds that would be allowed. But no, it was always forty-five seconds and that made me feel worse.

"And then we got to the theatre. My dear husband, Alexis Minotis, was even more upset than I all that day. I would tell him to be calm. I would say, 'Eef we get it' and he would say, 'But we must get it.'

"Well, he would not sit with me, but engaged two seats in another part of the theatre, where he sat with a very old friend of ours. I could see him, though: he had his hand over his eyes and would peek at me through his fingers. It made me feel very bad.

"And then they started and I listened, with waves and waves of nervousness going over me. But, can you believe it, when Theresa Wright said my name, I did not hear it!

"The first I knew was dear Preston Sturges turning around from his seat in front of me. He was laughing and clapping his hands and crying, 'Go on, Katina—it's you!'

"Then, my feet like lead and my knees shaking so that even Adrian's beautiful gown must have trembled, I climbed those steps and said my speech. I tried to remember the thirty seconds and I tried to speak to those brave boys who are fighting everywhere in the world for us and I tried to remember my tortured Greece. They tell me I did, for in a half-minute it was all over.

"Afterward we went to Mocambo to that lovely party. We all ordered steaks—beeg, thick steaks—and ate as if we hadn't seen food for a week.

"And we drank champagne and people came to say how glad they were. Lovely people whom I had never met before—beautiful, gracious Norma Shearer, exquisite Lana Turner. It was very wonderful.

"At half-past four in the morning we got home and there was the telephone ringing. It was my fine doctor who made me well from that very dangerous illness. And there was Tommy, my great Dane, with a very special welcome. I am sure he knew as well as anyone. And there was Josephine, my maid, waiting up, all smiles and gladness. It was my life's happiest time!"

DOES GAS KEEP YOU AWAKE NIGHTS?

GAS OFTEN SEEMS to be at its worst during the night. Frequently it seems to work up into the chest and throat when one lies down, which makes one feel smothery and breathless in bed. Some people try to sleep sitting in a chair. Others keep rising out of bed to get their breath easier.

Try KONJOLA, the medicine which acts in 3 ways to help ease gas misery. Sluggish digestion often promotes the accumulation of gas in one's intestinal tract. Bowel sluggishness may help to hold the gas inside to torment one with awful bloating. So KONJOLA not only contains Nature's herbs to help bring up gas from stomach, but also contains ingredients to aid digestion, and mildly helps to open constipated bowels and release gas.

Many users write their thanks and gratitude for the satisfactory results it produces. So when you feel bloated "clear through" . . . when stomach expands, intestines swell and bowels "balloon" way out, due to gas accumulating from slow digestion and sluggish bowel action, try this medicine and see what relief it can give. Be sure you get the genuine KONJOLA Medicine . . . read the directions on the package and take exactly as instructed. At all Drug Stores, on a strict guarantee of money back from the makers, if not completely satisfied with results from first bottle.

If you have never used Konjola, you can test its help for you by sending 10c for trial sample to KONJOLA, 6520 Selma, Los Angeles 28, California.

FRANK SINATRA

the thing was taking.

In the next scene, Gloria de Haven arrived in a taxi and rushed up to Frank and dragged him away before his shine was finished. They had trouble with this one, too. Either Gloria or Frank would step off their mark, or Gloria would come in too soon, or too late, or the cab would enter at the wrong time, or once more, Frank would miss his lines.

Sinatra has always said that he would rather sing anything in the world, and it must be true. While he was being lighted, and every time there was a minute or two wait before the camera, he sang little snatches of current tunes. He cut up with the electricians and grips. One of them asked him how he happened to have so much pep on such a horrible day. "Vitamins, my good man, those ever-lovin' vitamins."

It got, somehow, to be noon. Gloria de Haven, who is the Swooner's leading lady in "Room Service," was back to work for the first time since a bout with the measles. We three, Gloria, Frank and I, braved our way to the commissary. We probably could have arrived quicker via rowboat. It took us fully five minutes to get to our table. Frank stopped every few feet to answer to "hellos." The waitress seemed to have her own private campaign to make him gain weight. She suggested all manner of things hip-enlarging, but he settled for chicken broth, frankfurt and baked beans, and coffee.

A group of advertising men connected with the Hit Parade program were eating at the next table and one of them called to Frank and shook his finger at him. Frank looked at the package of cigarettes he had absent-mindedly picked up at the table. "I can just hear Barry Wood on the Hit Parade next week," he said blushingly.

Lunch chit-chat took us back to New Jersey. Frank talked about his family—how he missed them, how he was looking forward to seeing Swooner Junior for the first time. He said he had spoken to his four-year-old daughter Nancy on the telephone, and she had asked him. "When are you coming home, Daddy? Please come soon, because my baby brother is so cute!" He plans a good basic foundation for Nancy in music and perhaps study the harp, one of his favorite instruments.

"I'm probably guilty of spoiling her, but I can't help it," Frank added.

He hopes to buy a house in the San Fernando Valley and move the whole family to California for good, unusual weather notwithstanding.

"The climate out here is so good for kids," he said. "It's a swell place for them to grow up."

He plans to keep his home in New Jersey, however, which he calls The House That The Voice Built.

The conversation shifted to Bing Crosby. Frank told us how much fun he had had doing a Command Performance broadcast with Bing and Dinah Shore. There was one gag in the script that "broke" him up completely. Dinah and Bing were discussing Sinatra and Dinah said, "You know, Bing, a singer like Sinatra only comes along once in a lifetime."

Whereupon Crosby replied, "Yeah, but why did he have to come along in my lifetime?"

Frank's reverence for "The Groaner" is really something. "I don't know how that ridiculous feud business ever got started," he said. "Listening to Bing gave me my first desire to become a singer, and it was actually because of him that I decided to take it seriously."

Lunch over, we hurdled a couple of rivers and puddled our way back to the stage. Frank was given a quick makeup retouching and was back before the camera. Then things really began to boil. Every minute he wasn't before the camera was taken up with something. He signed pictures for members of the crew, mainly for their daughters; he was asked umpteen times for tickets to his various broadcasts; he signed autographs for visiting soldiers and ladies from out of town; he posed for still pictures; and Jerome relayed one telephone message after another.

Axel Stordahl, Sinatra's arranger and conductor, arrived and went into a huddle with Frank on an arrangement for one of the new tunes in the picture. Frank considers Axel to be just about the perfect orchestrator.

"You know, I don't know one note from the other, I don't know anything about chords, and I can't read music, but I'm going to take piano lessons one of these days and find out what really cooks."

The swooner's knowledge of classical music amazed me because he doesn't look the type. At his home in New Jersey he has five hundred albums of the longhair variety, including a complete collection of Richard Wagner's compositions. Wagner is his favorite. His knowledge and enthusiasm made me realize that Sinatra's success, in his field, was more than mere accident.

Frank and I were aroused from our rhythmic conversation by the peremptory command of the "still" man to "Move over here a minute for a couple of shots." It was the inevitable business of posing for a photographer, to which by this time he has become thoroughly accustomed. The shutters clicked and the flash bulbs popped as we continued our conversation, for Frank has learned the knack of taking everything in his stride. "One more, please," said the photographer. (They'll do it every time.) "Yeah, hurry it up," called Tim Whelan, the director, "or it'll be March 15th."

"Which is one date I don't want to be reminded of," answered the still man, "but I guess you don't like to think about that either, eh Frank?"

Sinatra looked serious a moment and then said, "No, as a matter of fact I don't mind thinking about it at all. I am in the highest income bracket and I pay ninety cents out of every dollar in taxes. But I'll tell you something—it gives me a swell feeling to know that I can do it. Other kids are beating their brains out in the jungles dodging Jap snipers or storming beachheads and machine gun nests."

Frank met each problem and situation with the same ease with which he sings. If he didn't operate in that easy-going manner I don't know how he could stand the pace.

There is a Sinatra temper lurking in the background, although he says he doesn't lose it unless there is a good reason—and then look out! For example, he told me, "One thing that really upset me—and it wasn't a big thing at all. The laundry situation out here is murder! For Christmas I received two dozen beautifully monogramed pure linen handkerchiefs, and I'll be darned if they didn't lose every single one of them. I hit the ceiling!"

On the other hand, The Voice knows how and likes to kid himself. Just before a closeup, the cameraman called to Frank that his nose was shiny. The lusty Sinatra baritone screamed, "Rembrandt—the paint!"

As the makeup man began to make with the comb, Frank warned him, "Don't touch that lock on my forehead. If I lose that, I'm finished in show business."

It was four now, and time for Frank to leave for rehearsal for his Lux Radio show at six. The character from the parking lot had delivered Frank's station wagon to the wrong gate. So we waited, trying as best we could to stand under the narrow shelter from the unwelcome moisture above the gate house. The RKO schoolroom is a few steps from the gate. When the inmates looked through the window and discovered that Sinatra, in person, not a motion picture, was there in the rain, out they came in a body for autographs. Frank signed every book, and when the last child had scurried back inside and the car had not yet arrived, the Sinatra temper began to seep through. We had been there almost ten minutes. Frank, like his rebellious lock of hair, began to look a bit ruffled. The whole Lux cast was waiting for him to rehearse. P.S.—the car came and we were off before any fireworks started.

It's only about a mile from RKO studios to the CBS Playhouse on Vine Street. I couldn't help thinking, as we drove, that probably nowhere else in the world, have so many careers and success stories had their rise and fall than within those few short blocks in the heart of Hollywood.

"You're on top of the ladder today, Frank, but how does the future look to you?" I asked him bluntly. "Do you think you'll last?"

"I don't think about that," he answered simply and honestly. "I just always do the best job I know how and if, as time goes by, something should happen, I'll do something else and do that the best I know how. I think the most important thing is to be a good human being." He said it with such sincerity you couldn't doubt it any more than you doubt that he sings directly to you and you and you, when his voice comes over your radio whispering of moonlight and roses.

In the parking lot adjoining the Playhouse, where Frank regularly parks his car on broadcast days, a loyal, steadfast Sinatra fan, dressed exactly as a Sinatra fan should look, came up to the car and handed him a single Cecil Brunner rose, wrapped in tissue paper. Frank told me that "come hail or high water," she is always there before every show, and always with a rose.

Frank apologized to the group of fans waiting by the stage door for not being able to sign their books because he was late for rehearsal. Two minutes after we were inside, Frank had his script in hand and was before the microphone, reading his lines and going over his songs. A few minutes later he walked off the stage and asked Jerome to get him some hot tea. He had barely finished with the word "tea" when a mob of song pluggers, those unnamed heroes of popular song successes, who prefer to be called music representatives, descended upon him like a host of hungry locusts advancing on an alfalfa patch.

"Listen to this lyric, Frank,"—"Did you hear Bing sing this last Thursday?"—"Frank, here's a natural," came in a profusion of words, snatches of tunes and gestures.

"Yes, I know,"—"I'll try,"—"Okay, Happy,"—"Sounds good," said Frank as he kept edging toward his dressing room and the orange pekoe.

With a few sips of tea under his belt he went into dress rehearsal of the show and then the broadcast itself. The echoes of Frank's last goodnight to the radio audience died away in the countless millions of loudspeakers across this great nation.

It was seven o'clock in California.

"Well, that's that," said Frank. "Now for a fast steak."

We headed for Chasen's, one of Hollywood's better beef emporiums. At last, I thought, this poor guy can have some food and a few minutes in peace. But I was wrong. We were no sooner in the door than confusion was upon us. The ever-present photographers snapped pictures as we went to our table. As the waiter handed Frank a menu, he also begged for a couple of autographs. All through the dinner people descended upon the tired swooner. We grabbed mouthfuls of food between the snatches of high pressure selling.

"Frank, I've been trying to see you about this song,"—"Did you get my message about the party?"—"I missed you at CBS, but I was wondering if . . ."— "Oh, Mr. Sinatra, you're my favorite singer, would you please sign my book?"—"Frank, could you look over here for one more shot?"

This was too much for me.

"Goodnight, Frank—it's been swell," I said weakly. "Please forgive me—but Man, I'm beat!"

The crowd closed in about The Voice, not remotely noticing my departure. I crawled to my car and headed for home.

Whew!

THE END

Persistent newest twosome usually involves Jess Barker. He does get frequent changes of heart. This time it's Susan Hayward on a dance date that pleases them both.

NEW PICTURE GUIDE

COVER GIRL (Columbia) is a grand musical extravaganza hampered by that routine plot which concerns the two talented, so-in-love hoofers, only one of whom gets the big break. So they separate. The girl goes on to glory. But you know love! Sure, it triumphs!

The dancing of Rita Hayworth and Gene Kelly is among the finest ever filmed. With Phil Silvers as a third partner, they step high, wide and handsome down a street to the tune of "Make Way For Tomorrow," one of seven new hit songs written for the show by Jerome Kern and Ira Gershwin. Then Gene follows this imaginative routine by doing a solo magically performed with the shadow of his alter-ego. It stops the show cold.

The finale is a stunning revue number that brings forth the fifteen cover beauties recruited by the studio for this gorgeous Technicolor spectacle. Scoring in supporting roles are Eve Arden, Otto Kruger, Lee Bowman and Leslie Brooks.

LADIES COURAGEOUS (Universal) is the first screen story about the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron, a group of only twenty-five girls who bravely pioneered a valued service in which several hundred of their sisters currently flying as the Women's Airforce Service Pilots. The Wafs had to prove themselves before the Army was willing to accept them as Wasps, and the thing they had to overcome was a military prejudice against women in important assignments.

Loretta Young appears as the leader of the intrepid band of twenty-five and she brings a fine sincerity to her role. Geraldine Fitzgerald enacts Loretta's sister whose grandstanding stunt of calling attention to herself by trick flying nearly puts the Wafs into disrepute. Anne Gwynne, Evelyn Ankers, June Vincent and Lois Collier play other members of the group. Hard to believe is the flirtation in which Loretta's husband prefers Diana Barrymore. But all in all, "Ladies Courageous" is a good movie about a previously untold work of women in the war.

THE NAVY WAY (Paramount) will give you a comprehensive glimpse of what goes on at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, an institution with traditions that match those of Annapolis and West Point. Yet Great Lakes is a location new to the screen.

Here Robert Lowery, a cocky prize fighter, Bill Henry, a son of wealth, Roscoe Karns, a mild-mannered clerk, Richard Powers, a sturdy Westerner, and Larry Nunn, a kid whose family has always been Navy, go through boot camp. Jean Arthur has a brief part as a Wave, and Robert Armstrong is a C.P.O. As the result of his performance, Lowery looks like a grade A bet for stardom.

THE FALCON OUT WEST (RKO) never rises above the average in this fairly popular detective series. Tom Conway continues in the title role. He gets out West on the trail of the killer of a millionaire rancher who seemingly drops dead from snake bite in a New York nightclub. There's a second murder before the case is solved, but none of it is particularly exciting.

LADIES IN WASHINGTON (20th Century-Fox) are not very ladylike, if we are to believe this program picture. One of the girls in Mother Henry's overcrowded boarding house gets a nice doctor involved in a shooting. The victim, however, turns out to have been a foreign agent, so all is forgiven. Trudy Marshall, Sheila Ryan, Anthony Quine and a newcomer named Ronald Graham. You can forget all about it.

YOU CAN'T RATION LOVE (Paramount) is one of those minor college musicals which tries being funny. It is supposed to be hilarious when the girl students work out a point rationing system to combat the shortage of male dates. Betty Rhodes and Johnnie Johnston, whom you know to be engaging kids, are the leading co-eds. Marjorie Weaver, who has been absent from Hollywood for some time, gives them trouble. Marie Wilson is in to act dumb.

BERMUDA MYSTERY (20th Century-Fox) should have been so much better than it is. There is a first-class problem in detection proposed when members of a group of six old cronies start dropping dead from poisoned cigarettes. The suspicions of Ann Rutherford, whose uncle was one of these men, involves Preston Foster, a big-time detective, in the case. He solves it, of course, but not until there has been a lot of painfully playful dialogue.

PREVIOUSLY RECOMMENDED

THE PURPLE HEART (20th Century-Fox) a smashing depiction of Japanese atrocities in the shocking trial of the eight captured Americans who bombed Tokyo.

SEE HERE, PRIVATE HARGROVE (MGM) first highly enjoyable comedy of rookies in training. Robert Walker a hit in the title role.

PHANTOM LADY (Universal) a little murder mystery that is scoring a surprise success which it richly deserves.

THE SULLIVANS (20th Century-Fox) the true and gloriously inspiring story of the home life of five lovable, scrappy American boys.

A GUY NAMED JOE (MGM) dedicated to the heartening notion that "pilots never die," but return to earth as guides to tyro aviators. Distinguished fantasy with Spencer Tracy, Irene Dunne and Van Johnson.

UP IN ARMS (Goldwyn-RKO) for its musical comedy introduction to a terrific entertainer named Danny Kaye. There's Dinah Shore, too.

THE UNINVITED (Paramount) Gail Russell is a shining new star in a love story of the supernatural that will keep you on the edge of your seat.

SONG OF BERNADETTE (20th Century-Fox) a spiritually uplifting screen masterpiece that tells of miracles wrought by indestructible faith. Jennifer Jones gives a beautiful performance.

MADAME CURIE (MGM) Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon play an exquisite love drama to the accompaniment of the discovery of radium.

JANE EYRE (20th Century-Fox) Charlotte Brontë's classic novel is filmed unforgettably. Superbly performed by Joan Fontaine.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK

are familiar with the views of every columnist who writes for the daily papers. So I talked and listened, talked and listened, for hours.

I blundered often. Frank had just been brought in from Sicily, so, trying to make a start at conversation, I asked:

"Oh, isn't Sicily a lovely place! Those majestic mountains—and the people so warm-hearted and friendly—"

"I wouldn't know, Ma'am," Frank answered a little mockingly. "I only got as far as the beach and just stayed two hours."

He'd been machine-gunned in both legs below the knees.

After that, I waited for them to tell me their stories, and gradually, some of them did. There was Joe. Joe had tried to take ammunition to an isolated company on an island in the Solomons. He ran into a Jap and in the hand-to-hand fight that followed, the enemy had knifed him from the hair-line down the forehead and down the bridge of the nose. Though Joe's face had been practically cut in half, he was proud of what he called his "beautiful" scar and was impatient for it to heal so he could get back on duty again.

Harry had been wounded so badly he couldn't remember the password when he crawled back to his lines. Only the protection of his guardian angel, he told me, kept him from being killed by his own pals.

Both Jimmy's feet had been frozen in the Aleutians and he was waiting there in the ward for the doctors to decide whether amputation would be necessary.

The bomb that went off too close to Lieutenant —— had taken one of his arms, both eyes and most of his face. They are doing everything they can for him and told me his morale was very high.

In the last war, a mental condition called "shell-shock" developed, and it was thought there was no help for it, but today they call it "combat fatigue" and know it can be cured.

Arnold's mind hasn't come back yet from the frozen Arctic vastness, and Chris still starts in horror from fitful sleep to hear the unearthly screeching of the Japs in the jungle trees all around him. But the doctors know that Arnold and Chris will find peace and rest again. The terror of the dreadful, shattering experiences they have lived through will be dimmed and their minds will become normal again.

But pity isn't what they want. They need friends and feminine companionship.

When these boys talk of home, it is things they know best—the farm, the job they used to have, school, football, the World Series, mother's cooking and how smart their little brother is. And, above all discussions of girls—always girls. The best girl, sister and her problems with work or boy-friend, the wife, the baby whom perhaps they've never seen. I must say I've never heard them talk of pin-ups.

Over and above all, there's that wonderful, resilient, bouncing American spirit of kidding. They kid everything and anything. They joke about their injuries; they kid the doctors and jolly the nurses.

For instance, a boy just brought from Italy told me he'd killed a Nazi.

"Which hand did you do it with?" I asked him.

"This one." With great pride he held up his right hand.

So I kissed it.

The boy in the next bed, not to be outdone, said he'd killed a Nazi, too.

"How?" I asked innocently.

"Oh, I just bit him to death!"

Now what would you do in a case like that? Yes, that's what I did, too. I kissed him.

When I asked them what they were going to do when they were well and discharged from the hospital, they all answered the same, with a quick eagerness that made me proud to know them.

"Why, go back, of course, Miss Oberon! We left a lot of unfinished business out there!"

So here is a point I would like to bring up. In this very modern and dreadful war, the wounded reach hospitals here at home very quickly; the most serious cases are always brought back by plane. Then the next-of-kin is notified by the War Department and Mother and Father —or both, if it is possible—make the journey from home to visit the boy for as long a time as circumstances will permit. These visits do not always solve the problem, however.

Sometimes there is no next-of-kin. I found this to be the case with one boy who didn't care about anything. When, after many visits, I finally made friends with him, I discovered that he was hurt, down deep inside, because he'd gone to fight for his country and had been gravely wounded—and now he felt he was left alone and forgotten by the people he'd fought for.

Now here is the plan to help these boys that I spoke of earlier. Many girls—and women, too—think they must be glamorous and dashing with a lot of idle time on their hands to serve in the entertainment of our wounded men. Or perhaps a housewife has too many routine cares and duties at home to sign up for regular appearances at the Canteen, Red Cross, U.S.O., or any of the other great organizations that are doing such splendid work. And she suffers from an uncomfortable, nagging sense of guilt because she can't be busy along with friends whose time is more free.

But here, busy housewife, or working girl with only brief hours to spare, is something you can do. There is, in all probability, a Government hospital within transportation distance of your home. It's easy to make arrangements by phone as to what time you may go and how long you may stay. Take a book or a magazine or a batch of home-made cookies, if you like. Or go empty-handed. It doesn't matter as long as you take along friendliness and cheerfulness and a genuinely sincere smile, and never any pity.

If it's not possible actually to visit the hospital, do it by letter. Adopt a boy, or two boys, or three, and let them know you're a friend and thinking of them. Write to them—clip funny or interesting items or jokes and send them along.

Find out their birthdays and mail them a card or small present. Remember them on holidays. Ask their advice sometimes about your own affairs. It will help make them feel they're one of your family, that they belong.

Perhaps it would make it easier to remember this little truism: There's always room in your life for one more friend.

I don't mean to preach. I don't even mean to insist. Neither I, nor the boys I plead for, would want you to make conscious "sacrifices," to be "noble"—to be patronizing. That isn't the idea at all.

But if you can find a boy—a boy who has, perhaps, fought his last battle and must now look to a future which for him isn't so very hopeful or so very bright. If you can find a boy like that, and can help him even a little bit to become a normal, useful citizen once more, I know you will have done him a service and you will have done your country a service.

More than that, you will have done something very wonderful for yourself.

LUM AND ABNER CONTEST

Left to right, Ruth Waterbury, Movieland's Editor, Chester Lauck (Lum), Perry Lieber, head of RKO publicity department and Norris Goff (Abner) look over your letters—some of which will win $2000 in War Bonds.

Well, by gum, we went and made a promise we won't be able to keep. We told you we would announce the winners of the Lum and Abner Contest in the June issue of Movieland. We really thought we would, but so many thousands of letters have come in that our judges are swamped and howling for more time to make their decisions. The lucky winners will be announced in the July issue of Movieland. This goes on the newsstands June 7th—and this time we mean it!

"We're scrimping on paper for Jim!"

CORPORAL JIM is in Italy doing his fighting job for Uncle Sam. The food he eats, the weapons and ammunition he uses, the blood plasma and medical supplies which may save his life, come to him in perfect condition because they are protected in shipment by paper and paperboard.

Jim's mother knows this. That's why you see her carrying her own market basket to save the grocer's precious paper bags. That's why she uses fewer paper towels and facial tissues. She conserves paper by "making each piece stretch."

Jim's father knows this. That's why he keeps figuring out even smarter ways of cutting down on paper consumption in his office. That's why he never asks store clerks to put extra wrappings on things that are already packaged and ready to carry. He conserves paper by "avoiding useless wrapping and accepting simpler packaging."

Jim's kid brother knows this. That's why he collects all the family's used paper for the local salvage drive. That's why he borrows and lends books, papers, magazines with all his friends. He's conserving paper by "sharing the printed word."

AVOID USELESS WRAPPINGS! • ACCEPT SIMPLER PACKAGING! • MAKE EACH PIECE STRETCH! • SHARE THE PRINTED WORD! •

PAPER PACKS A WAR PUNCH!

FIGHT WASTE!

Yes, Jim's family knows what scrimping on paper means to Jim.

And you do, too. That's why we know you are using less paper. That's why we know you are joining with all the other patriotic Americans from coast to coast who have vowed to save a million pounds of paper for the war effort!

This advertisement, contributed to the war effort by this magazine, was prepared by the War Advertising Council in cooperation with the War Production Board and the Office of War Information.

All the magazines in America, added together, USE only 5% of the nation's paper supply. Yet, out of this comparatively small amount, they are SAVING 450 million pounds this year and RELEASING it for vital war needs.

BETTY GRABLE BABY

the baby is lucky," she figured it out.

They bought a pink and blue Pig Bank and promptly labeled it: ITS First National Pig Bank. They deposited in ITS First National Pig Bank all the money they won playing poker and all the money that changed hands between them playing Gin Rummy.

During the entire time Betty was expecting the baby she felt like a million dollars. Because she is a level headed little person she seldom talked to her closest women friends, even to May or Lana, about what she wanted the baby to be when It grew up. "I just want a healthy, happy little baby" is about as far as she would go.

Or she would talk about getting back to work—soon—after the baby was born. "The studio is just waiting for Alice (Faye Harris) and me to have our babies—and then we'll do the 'Dolly Sisters' together. Who said 'sister act'? It will be a 'mama act' everything considered!"

No, it never crossed Betty's mind that she would have a bad time of it until that birth-night in the hospital.

Those endless, suffering hours however, Betty will mercifully forget. Women do. But they are strung along Harry's memory with the shock of a long nightmare.

The moment when the doctor had come out and said there were "complications" . . . he would like to call in another doctor for consultation . . . to await a normal birth might be another eight or ten hours . . . he advised a Caesarean. Mrs. James was showing amazing courage and strength—but it was becoming dangerous for the baby!

It was up to Harry to make up his mind—Harry with Betty's mother crying beside him. Harry had to give permission for the operation—if there was to be one.

He had lost track of time. He remembered—back that rainy afternoon when after taking Betty to the hospital, he had arrived an hour late for the rehearsal that preceded the broadcast. He hadn't made any explanation to the boys in the band. Couldn't. Not until Betty was safe. The boys had just looked at him and left him alone.

And then the moment the rehearsal was over, he was back to the hospital, the Cedars of Lebanon, and nothing had happened—yet. He walked up and down the floor of the famous "Father's Room"—even flipped through the book wherein other fathers, going through this same thing, had written some of their thoughts or signed their names. Harry didn't write anything in the book.

This floor pacing with fathers was supposed to be funny. But it was far from funny when they would come and say: "You may speak to your wife for just a few minutes now." Betty didn't speak. They didn't want her to. They wanted her to conserve every ounce of her strength.

But it broke Harry's heart the way she tried to smile each time even though the nurse had to wipe off her face with a cool cloth for the effort the smile cost her.

Each time he would say the same thing when he came back to Betty's mother. "She is the most wonderful kid in the world. No one could be so brave—so courageous."

And still the endless hours went by waiting . . . waiting . . . waiting. At midnight Betty's mother sent him across the street to get a cup of coffee. He couldn't swallow it but brought back a sandwich for her. Some of their friends called. No, there was no news yet. Just waiting.

Then the doctor had told them he advised the operation. The other doctor came for the consultation. Both doctors advised it. Harry just nodded his head.

At 4:30 a.m. that Friday morning of March 3rd, they came and told him it was a little girl. The doctors and nurses said: "Congratulations! A lovely little girl. Seven pounds, ten ounces. Blue eyes, blonde hair—just like her mother. A regular Pin-Up Girl already." And they said Harry could stand outside in the corridor and speak to Betty as they wheeled her down to her room below.

The first thing she said when she saw him was, "Honey you aren't disappointed because it's a girl, are you?" And then in a voice barely above a whisper, "I'll have a little boy for you—honest I will!"

"Disappointed!" Harry almost choked on the word, "Baby—I wanted a little girl all the time!"

But he was so excited he forgot to ask to see his daughter, Victoria Elizabeth James. He had been thinking of Betty so hard he didn't remember to ask to see the miniature edition of her until after he had been home, changed his clothes and returned to the hospital.

The reporters were around now—hot and heavy on the trail of an interview with the new father. But Harry didn't want to talk.

Because he is a nice guy and the newspaper boys are his pals, he put it this way: "You see, we have sort of agreed that whenever we talk about the baby for publication both of us will be around. I don't want to talk about "my" baby until Betty is strong enough to be present. It's always to be 'our' baby."

And that's the way it will be until Mr. and Mrs. Harry James can talk about "their" baby together!

3 ways to tell a Fib

(FROM ANY OTHER TAMPON)

Only FIBS* of all tampons give you all 3

1. Fibs are "quilted"

. . . for more comfort, greater safety in internal protection—that's why, with Fibs, there's no danger of cotton particles clinging to delicate membranes. And quilting controls expansion . . . so Fibs don't fluff up to an uncomfortable size which might cause pressure, irritation, difficult removal.

2 Fibs have rounded ends

. . . smooth, gently-tapered ends . . . for easy insertion! Unlike any leading tampon you've ever tried. Your own eyes tell you that Fibs must be easier to use! You'll like the just-right size of Fibs; they're not too large, not too tiny.

3 Fibs—the Kotex* Tampon

. . . a name you know, a tampon you can trust. No other brand is made of Cellucotton*, the soft, super absorbent used in Kotex and demanded by many of America's foremost hospitals! In Fibs, as in Kotex, there's no compromise with quality—you get protection as safe as science can make it.

WORDS OF MUSIC

"Follow The Boys." But it could just as well have been "Follow The Stars," cause Brother, they've got 'em. It's a picture about what the country's leading artists are doing to entertain the service men. George Raft, Zorina, Dinah Shore, Jeanette MacDonald, Marlene Dietrich, Orson Welles (I could go on for years), are all present and accounted for besides the orchestras of Freddie Slack, Charlie Spivak, Ted Lewis, Louis Jordan and pianist, Rubinstein. Oh yes, and I almost forgot Donald O'Connor, Peggy Ryan, The Andrews Sisters, Sophie Tucker and Alan Curtis—anyway, see it . . . Another Universal picture, "Pardon My Rhythm," sounds like a lot of fun. It stars Gloria Jean and gives Bob Crosby his first big acting part. Gloria's romance in the film is Mel Torme, drummer and singer, who used to cavort with the old Chico Marx band . . .

ON THE BEAM:

If you like an all-music program, you'll be glad to know about the new fifteen minute show, "Top Of The Evening," every Monday, Wednesday and Friday over the Blue Network. Ken Darby directs the chorus of sixteen men, there's a fine double piano team, plus "The King's Men," and Sally Sweetland. Sally's name may be new to you, but her voice isn't. For some time she was the "Miss" with the "Six Hits" and her vocal chords have done the screen singing for Joan Fontaine in "Constant Nymph" and for Joan Leslie in the soon to be seen "Rhapsody In Blue."

You amateur song writers shouldn't miss the new "Song Is Born" Monday series over N.B.C. It's a contest deal and the winning song will be published by B.M.I. Pat Kaye, the girl vocalist on this program, shows promise of hitting the big time . . .

Harry James didn't re-sign with Chesterfield when his contract was up in March. They wanted him to travel but he wanted to stay in Hollywood until the birth of his daughter, Victoria. Harry is 1A and will probably be in khaki by the time you read this . . .

Dinah Shore and George Montgomery moved into their honeymoon home, or at least into two rooms of it. That's all the furniture they have so far. Dinah's arranger-accompanist, "Ticker" Freeman, has been accepted in Ye Olde Army. So far she hasn't made any decision on a new boy . . .

Spike Jones and His City Slickers introduced a new ditty on the Bob Burns show. It pokes fun at this land of sunshine and flowers as you can tell by the title, "It Never, Never Rains in California." Very funny. . . . And have you heard Cass Daley's hysterical version of "I'm Getting Corns For My Country At The Stage Door Canteen?"

Kay Kyser has had a bomber in England named after his radio greeting, "Evenin' Folks, how'ya all?"

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Music from below the border is well presented on Columbia's Xavier Cugat album, "Mexico." There are eight sides, including "Chiapanecas" and "Mexican Hat Dance." Vocals are handled by Carmen Castillo, Lina Romay, and Miguelito Valdes . . . Ginny Simms gives us two good tunes, "Suddenly It's Spring" and "Irresistible You," with the accompaniment of a vocal group. "Irresistible" is from Ginny's starring Metro picture, "Broadway Rhythm."

Moving over to Capitol, we find a new release by Jo Stafford. "I Love You," the Cole Porter tune from "Mexican Hayride" and Jerome Kern's "Long Ago and Far Away," from the picture "Cover Girl." Paul Weston made the arrangements and conducted the orchestra. Incidentally, Paul has just been made recording director for Capitol . . . That solid King Cole trio has done "Straighten Up and Fly Right" and "I Can't See For Lookin'." Cole does the singing and there is good guitar work by Oscar Moore . . . Paul Weston holds the baton again on Johnnie Johnston's "Spring Will Be A Little Late This Year" and "Irresistible You." Weston has made an excellent arrangement of the "Spring" tune which Deanna Durbin sings in Universal's "Christmas Holiday" . . . Ella Mae Morse, who did all right on her theatre tour, has done more than all right on her latest record, "Tess' Torch Song," and "Milk Man, Keep Those Bottles Quiet." Her husband, Dick Walters, gets orchestra credit . . . Betty Hutton and Jerry Colonna have signed contracts to wax for Capitol. Betty will do her usual stuff and Jerry is going to make a series of his amusing musical monologues . . .

Decca seems to have cornered the market on New York musical show albums. Their latest is the score from the Air Force production, "Winged Victory." Four sides with the "Victory" chorus and orchestra . . .

The Herman Herd is upon us once more. Woody and the boys do "The Music Stopped" and "I Couldn't Sleep A Wink Last Night" with Frances Wayne in the singing department. Frances has plenty on the ball . . .

Fred Waring, who doesn't often record pop tunes, has done "Now I Know" and "Tess' Torch Song" with Donna Dae and the Waring Glee Club.

I'm not a Lombardo fan, but for those of you who are, there's his version of "Love, Love, Love," and "Can't You Do A Friend A Favor." Skip Nelson, ex-Glenn Miller baritone, is on "Love."

Kenny Baker, who has been such a success in new York's "One Touch of Venus," has a good solo record in "Marianne" and "Easter Sunday With You" with Harry Sosnik's orchestra . . .

Andy Kirk and the Clouds of Joy jump onto wax with "Unlucky Blues" and "Ride On, Ride On." June Richmond sings, and very good for my money . . .

Dick Haymes is luckier than Frank Sinatra when it comes to making records because he can have an orchestra behind him. And the music on his new platter is but wonderful! Toots Camarata is the man with the stick. He used to arrange for Jimmy Dorsey and Casa Loma, and at one time played trumpet with J.D. Dick sings, "If You Were The Only Girl" and "Home," assisted by the Song Spinners . . .

Sister Rosetta Tharpe, the Negro gal Lucky Millinder discovered singing in a church in Brooklyn, shows what she means on her gospel disc, "Sleep My Darling Mother," and "I Want To Live So God Can Use Me," with guitar accompaniment.

In the Hillbilly corner we find Jimmy Wakely and his string band humming and strumming "A Tiny Little Voice In A Tiny Little Prayer" and "I'm Sending You Red Roses." Also the "Sons Of the Pioneers" wail "Home In San Antone" and "I Hang My Head and Cry."

If you're hungry for fish and poi, get Brunswick's Johnny Noble Album—eight sides of Hawaiian stuff, including "King Serenade" and "Song Of The Islands."

JAM NOTES:

Artie Shaw is out of the Navy with a medical discharge. No one seems to know what he's going to do, but it wouldn't surprise me if he organized a band . . . Ray Eberle has been on a successful theatre tour in the east. He is coming back to Universal, but on a picture to picture deal rather than a term contract . . . Remember Ray Bauduc, Bob Crosby's sensational drummer? He is now the leader of the 211th Coast Artillery Band in Vallejo, California . . . Danny O'Neill, the tenor who created quite a stir in Chicago radio, has been signed by Columbia Pictures . . . Judy Tuvim, attractive singer with "The Revuers," was signed by Twentieth Century . . . Here's the latest Draft Report Card: Woody Herman, 1A, Charlie Spivak, 4F, Dennis Day, 1A, Johnnie Johnston, 4F . . . Eddie Miller is already in olive drab. Before he left, he recorded several sides for Capitol, but they won't be released for some time. The fate of his band is also up in the air, but Nappy Lamare may take it over . . . Frank Sinatra turned the tables on those who kid-dingly call him "The Voice." He has tabbed his new fighter, "The Fist." . . . The Merry Macs' Decca disc of "Mairzy Doats" sold over five hundred thousand copies the first day it was released in New York. The Macs are now on a personal appearance tour, but they left Hollywood with heavy hearts. The youngest brother, Joe MacMichael, died suddenly February twelfth. Joe had a severe cold and took an overdose of a sulfa drug by mistake, which affected his kidneys and caused his death. He had been in the army a few months and was stationed at the Santa Ana Air Base. Joe's passing was particularly tragic, because he was on his honeymoon at the time, having been married a week previously to Inez James, Universal song writer . . . The music world had another loss in February when Bob Zurke passed away, after a two-day illness of pneumonia. Bob won fame when he played piano with the old Bob Crosby band and made such great records as "Milk Cow Blues" and "Honky Tonk Train." . . . Gene Krupa is still drumming it with Tommy Dorsey at this writing, awaiting appeal on his trial in San Francisco. Gene says he will not reorganize his own band until after the war. If he is cleared of the charges he may go into service.

At the stroke of the chimes it will be . . . I mean, that's all for this time. See you next month with lots of New York news. I'm going back to the big city and see what's doin'. In the meanwhile, if you have any little questions on any little things musical, drop me a line. FOCUS ON Flat-tops

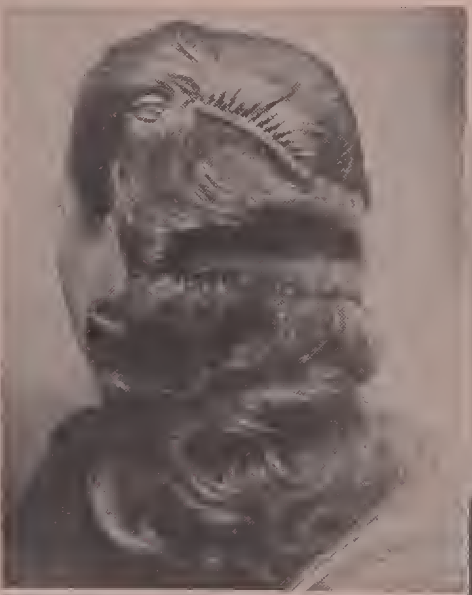
BY SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

"Flat-Tops" are a familiar theme. It's the variations that make them new and exciting.

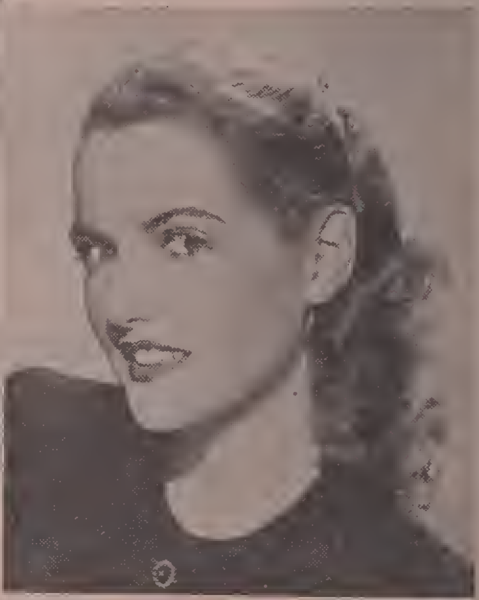
Take this interesting hairstyle which Helen Turpin of Warner Bros. has designed for Virginia Patton to wear in "Janie." It's simple, forthright and becoming—good for busy daytime hours or gayer, dancing evenings.

Like all the current coiffures, it demands hair that shines with health and cleanliness. And it requires a firm hand with the hairbrush.

If you would copy Virginia's coif, sweep your hair up and back from the right temple. Now fasten it securely with hairtainers. One catches the heavy side hair just off-center in the back. The other anchors the smooth left-side hair to keep it firmly, sleekly in place.



Virginia's back hair has been parted off in sections and waved to the ends.



This brushed-round-the-head swirl is firmly held in place at left side back.

EXPRESSED DESIRES

thanked her politely, but Mother sensed a certain luke warmness about it all. "You don't really like it, do you?" she probed.

Loretta acknowledged that she wasn't exactly mad about it, and Mrs. Belzer suggested briskly and good-naturedly that Loretta send it right over to her house.

It was done. So (maybe you've guessed)—a week or so later an expert from the East, one of those high-powered gentlemen who commands important money for really knowing his antiques, dined with Mrs. Belzer.

"You have some lovely things," he told her, judicially. "But one of them is priceless. A gem. A thing to make a collector's mouth water. It's that book case."

Loretta's mother said, quietly, "Do you want it back, daughter?"

Loretta, quick as anything, gulped, "Yep! please!" Afterward she added, "I was completely shameless about it!" Loretta has always been quick to learn, but her nicest characteristic is her ability to kid herself!

Some of the most astonishing people really know their antiques. One of them is Lloyd Nolan—who collects milk glass, for heaven's sake! Another is Pat O'Brien, who owns some of the most valuable furniture in Hollywood, but who admits that the only thing he knows about how a room should be arranged is that he always thinks everything should be changed in any room he looks at. "Let's move everything!" he suggests, happily, and starts shoving pianos and sofas.

Lillian MacMurry, who knows her winks and nods at the best auctions, was astounded when Fred began to show some astuteness of his own at picking up a gem-of-a-chair in an unexpected place. His taste runs to early American, and when they were furnishing their house, he demanded free rein when it came to furnishing his own special room. "He calls it an 'assembled job'," his wife says. "He acquired a chair here and a table there, without any discernible plan. But when he was through, the whole thing was right. The things all belonged together. Fred is really good!"

Greer Garson is good, too, and she did a really lovely job on her own home. It expresses her. But it may be a trifle surprising, to anyone who tries to interpret her by a casual glance, to see the things with which she has surrounded herself. For Greer is no true "Madame Curie." Into a beautifully balanced living room she has determinedly put two grand pianos. She loves luxury, soft lights, soft velvet and vivid, contrasting colors. Greer adores music, and what's more, she likes to play duets. And what is still more, she proposes to be prepared in case anyone strays in who might be willing to play one with her. Fortunately her drawing room is large enough to swallow up the two pianos and yet have plenty of space to spare.

Her typewriter is likely to appear on the dining table, on a hall chair or in the patio, at any moment—for Greer writes. She writes little poems and brief, humorous sketches. She never does anything with these, except to paste them in a book or occasionally include one in a letter to an intimate friend. But she has had the conviction that she must try to write, ever since that first job of hers in London, writing advertising. Her first assignment, she recalls, was to make a survey to discover how many cakes of toilet soap were used per year in India. To this day, the sight of a cake of soap causes the Garson eyebrows to rise with a speculative expresison. "Now . . . I wonder how many . . . ?" she wonders.

To get back to antiques, the most wistful and perhaps the most triumphant enthusiast in Hollywood is Vincent Price He maintains that he can't afford to buy and own the precious objects which absorb him. So he maintains a small and very discerning shop in Beverly Hills, where he takes rare objects on consignment to sell to more affluent people. "I can have them around for awhile," he explains. "I can touch them, look at them, enjoy them. I can even sit on them, if I want to!"

There is a man who knows how to compensate for suppressed desires and make a neat profit on the deal!

About one actor in three wants to write and avers that he will—someday. Those two Navy bigshots, Lt. Commanders Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., and Robert Montgomery, belong in this class. But just as many seem to want to make with music, and they want to do it right now. And a lot of them will do it, too, in spite of anything you can do about it. George Sanders wants to croon or play a sax, and he isn't particular about where he does it or whether anyone urges him, as you'll find if you know him for just a little while. Jim Brown wants to sing on the radio, and he has what he calls "a sure hunch" that he'll "be doin' just that—if the picture business doesn't hold up." Robert Alda wants to lead a band. He had a perfectly tremendous moment when they let him take that little stick and wave it about in front of a real "name band" at a bond show. He was so excited that he forgot to ascertain what the number was that he was supposed to be leading. But he thinks he kept time with the music!

But he didn't have any more fun with his stick than Bette Davis had singing. Bette, you understand, doesn't imagine that she can sing. She just wants to. Ever since they let her twirple "They're Either Too Young Or Too Old" in "Thank Your Lucky Stars," Bette has had a lurking look in her eye of evenings, at the Hollywood Canteen. At the slightest suggestion of a lull in the chatter, there is Betty, ready to give out with her specialty. "Maybe I can't really sing it," she admits. Then she beams. "But I can sort of sell a song, now can't I?" She can, too.

John Garfield avidly draws plans for groups of houses whose inmates will be encouraged to have children and dogs. This is on account of distressing personal experiences of John, who has both children and dogs, and who rents his home. In the past two years he has lived in (1) a Swiss chalet (2) a Spanish hacienda (3) a semi-mansion, complete with gardens, orchards, swimming pool, on an estate in the Valley (4) a sort of Cuban dwelling, his present one, which confuses him with labyrinths of bright-tiled passages with grilled iron gates. "What I want," he moans, "is just a house with some bedrooms and a fence around it. Fifty million other people must want them, too. S'help me, I'm going to build some of them, and no tenant will be admitted who hasn't at least two kids and two dogs!"

Ann Sheridan cooks—but with a purpose. She experiments with Mexican food because she definitely and seriously plans to open a "real Mexican restaurant, with authentic Mexican food" in Hollywood, with as little delay as possible. Her triumph, to date, is a chicken concoction with the doggonedest things in it—most of them hot. Meanwhile she relaxes at home as often as possible (at least once a week) with congenial and carefully selected friends and Carmen Miranda's orchestra giving out with music which is a cinch to cement good neighbor relationships, if they can just hold out. The band, I mean.

Joan Blondell has always doted on taking cars apart. But now, after having driven numbers of garage mechanics to distraction with questions, she has finally reached a stage at which she can also start to put the thing back together. "I also," she says, impressively, "am very versatile with salads." Maybe that comforts the mechanics. It just confuses me.

They're very much in earnest about these avocations, these actors. And most of them have a sneaking and comforting feeling that they could be made to pay off in dollars and cents if, as Jim Brown says, "the picture business doesn't hold up!"

The main issue in the United States was whether Garbo or Hepburn would win out—and who was imitating whom . . . Out of thirty girls chosen from a beauty contest for "Search For Beauty," one stayed in Hollywood; a sultry Texan cookie named Clara Lou Sheridan, later known as Annie the Oomph . . . Bing Crosby appeared in "Going Hollywood" with Marion Davies, whereupon critics remarked "the lad is also an actor" . . . Rudy Vallee dating Peggy Hopkins Joyce . . . Jean Harlow was lighting up the town with her platinum hair, and unimportant Bette Davis, let out by Universal, followed suit . . . Gail Patrick wowed the town with her coiffure, a grim arrangement of hair plastered flat over the brow, followed by anchovie-like ringlets to the ears and neckline. . . . Shirley Gray was considered fashionable wearing the following ornaments, all smothered in black satin—bracelets, earrings, belt, and necklace down to here. . . . Columbia was filming an unimportant little comedy, "It Happened One Night," and its stars, Claudette Colbert and Clark Gable, were thought to be all washed up. . . . Yes, this was Hollywood.

Robert Montgomery, Norma Shearer and Herbert Marshall as the famous trio appeared in "Riptide, best picture of month 10 years ago.

RANDOLPH SCOTT WEDDING

I've talked to Randy several times during the past year—usually over a telephone—when he hasn't been so happy. His troubles were an open secret in Hollywood.

For the past two years, everyone knew that Randy Scott, the popular cowboy actor, had been in love with the lovely Patricia Stillman, San Francisco socialite. They were everywhere together. Sometimes with their good friends, the Fred Astaires, in the smart cocktail lounges. Or dining quietly at a table for two at the Mocambo. Or in their regular Friday night seats at the fights.

Ever since her brilliant debut in San Francisco several years ago, the russet-haired, brown-eyed "Pat" Stillman had been as vivid a socialite-glamour figure to West Coast social circles as Brenda Frazier had been to New York.

Like Brenda, Pat comes of a tremendously wealthy family, the Stillmans of banking circles. What Pat said and what she wore was ardently copied by other less glamorous ladies of the social world. She was pretty enough to be a movie actress and when she visited Hollywood, which was frequently, she spent much time with the movie people. But she was never interested in a career for herself.

In due time it was almost inevitable that she should meet Randy Scott—for Randy moves well in the fore of Hollywood's best social sets. Don't let his silent hero, pistol packin' Western roles fool you. The silent, sun-tanned Mr. Scott has long been one of the most "accepted" members of the movie colony with the "Who's Who" of the West, East and South.

So, in due time, Pat and Randy met a few years ago at the beach home of Townsend Netcher. If it wasn't a case of love at first sight, it was so close that the difference wasn't noticeable.

Here were two people who seemingly had everything—looks, position, money, success. But in the beginning everybody was afraid that this was one of the most ill-fated of all Hollywood romances.

For some reason it looked as though Randy's estranged wife, Marion Dupont Somerville Scott, might not give him a divorce, even though they had lived together just a few months following their marriage five years ago.

If ever a marriage mystified Hollywood, it was the one between Marion Dupont Somerville—member of the famous Dupont family—and the reserved Mr. Scott, of Hollywood fame.

Soon after their wedding, during the height of the Santa Anita season, she had made her first and only visit to Hollywood. Apparently, Marion Dupont Scott did not care for the movie "crowd." They in turn found her to be an unusual woman.

She dressed more conservatively than any school teacher. Her long, narrow face was always free of makeup. Perhaps because she had no real interest in pictures and no common ground on which to base an acquaintance with movie people, she seemed reserved almost to the point of coolness with those she met.

Her only interest seemed to be in horses (she has bred and raised them for years in Virginia) and when the Santa Anita season was over that year, Randy's bride quietly departed. To the best of available knowledge, she hasn't been back since.

Randy's career kept him in Hollywood—or it seemed to—after that first year. He never discussed his amazing marriage with the press—not even with his closest friends. One of his pals once said:

"As close as I have been to Randy, all I know about his romance and marriage with Mrs. Somerville is what I have been able to piece together from mutual friends. As I understand it, they had known each other a long time. Their families were friends back in Virginia, and they were neighbors.

"Marion Dupont was older than Randy, but when he was a kid she was a glamorous and idealistic figure to him. She was deeply interested in the things that interested him—for this was long before he ever dreamed he would become a movie actor. Randy's father was an administrative engineer and he hoped his son would follow in his footsteps and become an engineer, too. He was prepping at Woodbury Forest, Virginia, with engineering in mind, but his real interest was in horses, breeding and raising them.

"Marion Dupont had the reputation for being one of the finest horse-women in the South. She must have known of Randy's admiration and infatuation for her, for they were close friends and spent much time together. But he was much younger and perhaps she didn't take him too seriously. Anyway, she married Somerville and when the first World War came along, Randy enlisted and was sent to England and later to France.

"After the war, Randy came back home and took up engineering again—mostly because his father wanted him to. Or maybe he wanted to come back to Virginia because he had never quite forgotten Marion Dupont.

"Meanwhile, her marriage was over, and she and Randy resumed their life-long friendship. But the years and the war had brought about changes. Randy had lost interest in a future engineering career. He didn't know exactly what he wanted to do. He was restless.

"So he took time off to travel, trying to decide how to carve his future course in life. He became interested in acting from attending small theaters across the country. When he reached Hollywood several years later, he decided to give acting a fling and joined the Pasadena Community Players. You know the rest. The movies soon claimed him and because he was the personification of the tall-silent-lanky-Westerner-of-the-Gary-Cooper-school, he wasn't long in forging to the top.

"But even though he was in Hollywood, he wasn't exactly of it. He is a great fellow, one of the most popular men I know. But his private life, even where his great circle of friends was concerned, has always been strictly his own.

"About five years ago—without telling even his best pals his intentions—he went back East and married Mrs. Somerville. The years had changed the two people involved more than either suspected. He never told anyone anything about it. Certainly, no one ever heard him going into romantic rhapsodies. His very closest friends could only guess that this had been one of those flames that once upon a time had flared high; but when the time came to make it real, it was obvious their interests were no longer the same. After that first year, it was just sort of generally understood that Randy and his wife were estranged."

And perhaps it would have remained merely an estrangement, become one of those marriages where the partners separate but do not part, legally, if Randy had not met and fallen in love with the beautiful Pat Stillman.

Hollywood believes that many times after that meeting that meant so much to him, Randy asked his wife to divorce him. A year dragged by without any legal action from her. And then another year.

Pat and Randy had begun to believe their romance was hopeless. Six months ago they had a long talk and decided not to see each other any more. Those were the most miserable months of Randy's life. The handsome Mr. Scott was seen nowhere after that, or if he was briefly glimpsed at any party, he was always alone.

Once in a while we would get a false tip that Mrs. Scott was filing a divorce suit in Reno, or Las Vegas. But every time I checked with Randy he would say:

"Please don't print anything. I have received no information that Mrs. Scott has any plans for divorce. She hasn't been in either Reno or Las Vegas."

Without Pat, Randy's life was hardly worth living. But one of the salvations was his work. He was making "Gung Ho" at Universal, and during the filming of that picture he struck up a friendship with Lt. Colonel Evans F. Carlson—on whose exploits (the Carlson's Makin Island Raiders) the movie is based.

Randy lived almost continuously with the Marines assigned to the picture. He believed firmly that his personal life was on the rocks. He was past the age of joining up for Uncle Sam whom he had served in the last war. But he wanted more than anything else to do his bit entertaining and visiting our fighting men "down under." It was both an escape and a patriotic obsession with him and, as usual, he did a grand job.

The minute the movie was finished, the Victory Committee sent Randy to an "undisclosed destination." For six weeks he visited the hospitals, entertained at our camps in the South Pacific and, in a measure, forgot his own troubles in the talks he had with the injured and fighting men.

When he came back to Hollywood, finally, he had no inkling that anything in his personal fortunes had changed. But he was due for a surprise. Marion Dupont Scott had sued for, and obtained, a divorce! Randy was as surprised as anybody—but here it was at last!

Typically, when Randy's wife did make up her mind to divorce him, she did it as quietly and mysteriously as she had done everything that concerned her marriage. Outside of Randy and herself, no one is yet quite sure where the divorce was obtained or on what grounds it was secured.

But this much is known: Less than twenty-four hours after Randy learned he was a free man after five years, he re-married. The lovely Patricia Stillman became Mrs. Randolph Scott.

He is honeymooning at his beach house with the brand new Mrs. Scott—two people who had come through two years of doubt and uncertainty and heartache to become, as Randy said over the phone, "the happiest people in the world!"

CHARLES COBURN

the "road," I met on intimate and friendly terms the fine actors and actresses I had so long admired. I was fired with an ambition to become one of them."

He was nineteen and he went to live frugally in a New York theatrical boarding house, to wait for the stage to discover him. When things became just too frugal, he eked out his money with such odd jobs as theater ushering, bundle wrapping at Altman's department store, and professional cycling.

There was no particular affinity between Charles and bundle-wrapping, but he was good enough at the racing to have continued in it as a career.

Came the break, our hero got his chance just before starvation as Ursus in "Quo Vadis." The event was unheralded by the stage world, taking place in a dusty little midwestern town under the auspices of a travelling stock company. A year later, the year 1900 to be exact, young Coburn hit Broadway in an appropriate production titled "Up York State."

It is no more possible to include the entire career of Charles Coburn in one story than to squeeze the half-dozen volumes of Gibbons' "Rise and Fall" between one set of covers. Some historian of the theater will one day chronicle Mr. Coburn's 37 years in greasepaint, and find them lush with achievement. The story will include his marriage to young actress Ivah Wills, and the thirty years during which the classic works of Shakespeare, Moliere, Mackaye and the popular masterpiece "The Better 'Ole" of Bruce Bairnsfeather, came to the boards under the co-production of Mr. & Mrs. Coburn. For the present, however, we are going to have to stick to Dingle who was present in Charles, if not in name, at least in spirit, even in his pre-Hollywood days.

There was, for instance, Mr. Coburn's innate talent for match-making. There were more marriages taking place among the young actors and actresses of the Coburn Players than in any other repertory company in the business. Let a couple turn shy in each other's presence and Coburn, who knew all the preliminary symptoms, soon had them saying "I do" as naturally as if it were an entrance cue for "Midsummer Night's Dream." The list of examples is long, but one of them you will recognize as character actor Thomas Mitchell who met and married Anne Brewer Mitchell thirty years ago, under the sly prompting of Coburn.

Dingle's penchant for getting into trouble was also an early trait in the Coburn make-up. There was that hectic night on a New York stage, for example, when Charles did some of the most earnest acting of his life—at the point of a madman's gun.

The play was "Diplomacy," featuring an all star cast including Margaret Anglin, Tyrone Power (our Ty's Dad), Cissie Loftus, Frances Starr, Helen Gahagan (now Mrs. Melvyn Douglas) and others. At the opening of the second act, when Coburn and Miss Gahagan stood alone on the stage, there was a sudden cry from the aisle.

"Get off that stage, or I'll kill you!"

Those were the days before Olsen and Johnson, when a disturbance from the audience was the exception rather than the rule—but let Mr. Coburn tell it:

"I looked out over the footlights and there stood a red-faced fellow, wild-haired, measuring about six foot two, and pointing his revolver straight at me. 'I'll kill you,' he repeated, and I had no reason to doubt him. I considered a jump into the orchestra pit, but discarded the idea as an ungallant way to take my leave of Miss Gahagan.

"We went on with our lines. The young man never moved either the revolver or his gaze and seemed only to be quietly considering what part of my body the bullet was going to pierce. Mentally I held a very faint debate as to the advantages of being hit in the chest, over those of being hit in the abdomen. I couldn't see any use in trying to argue with the gunman, since it might only enrage him more.

"Finally, my bad tempered friend said, 'You're goin' to get it—' But just at that moment, at the back of the theater, I could see an ushers' posse of six forming to sneak up to him. My only chance was to keep his attention averted until the posse could grab him without any danger of shots going wild into the stricken audience. Never, during the run of any play, were lines read with such emotional fervor. Miss Gahagan was a trouper clear through, but her nails bit into my hands so deeply I had the marks for weeks afterwards.

"The posse caught him. It turned out he was in love with Margaret Anglin, though it was no fault of hers since she had never seen him before. The boy was quite mad—although just why he was mad at me, no one has been able to figure out. Perhaps I may have appealed to him as a more ample target than Margaret. I tell you, it was the only time in my life I really longed to be the Thin Man!"

Or consider an episode which took place one summer season when the Coburn Players were holding their annual dramatic festival at Columbia University. The play was "Macbeth" and it was staged outdoors in a grove of trees which grew right outside the school's boiler room.

The Shakespearean saga had progressed to that seventeenth century forerunner of the chiller-diller, the Witches scene, and Mr. Coburn had just made inquiry of the world at large:

"What is that noise?"

Bang, as if on cue, there came a thunderous roar that shook the audience nearly out of its seats—and surprised the actors almost out of their skins.

"—and why sinks this cauldron?" quavered Mr. Coburn.

Swish, a great all-enveloping cloud of steam spread over the stage!

The actors stood rooted to the turf. "Beware of McDuff—" intoned a witch tremulously, and a second roar lent emphasis to her threat.

When the last rumble had died and the vapors subsided, the spectators broke into spontaneous applause, and the actors realized that in some miraculous fashion they were still alive. The audience crowded round to congratulate Mr. Coburn on the marvelous off-stage effects. "How did you do it?" they asked.

Having learned by then that one of the school's boilers had blown a cylinder head during his show, Mr. Coburn modestly passed the whole thing off as an experiment, adding his regret that the effect was a little too expensive to be repeated at every performance.

Coburn's favorite stage role of them all was that of Ol' Bill in Bairnsfeather's "The Better 'Ole," a classic of the last war. His favorite screen roles include his first, which was that of the reprobate Dr. Shingle in "Of Human Hearts"; the sadistic Dr. Gordon in "Kings Row"; the devilish millionaire of "The Devil and Miss Jones," you-know-whom in "The More The Merrier," and the broad-minded grand-pop of the current "Heaven Can Wait."

His introduction to the screen came in 1937, when MGM invited him to play the medico's role in "Of Human Hearts." (With Walter Huston, Jimmy Stewart, Beulah Bondi and a beautiful brown horse, remember?)

He will never forget his first day as a movie actor. The troupe, under the direction of Clarence Brown, was shooting on location at Lake Arrowhead. The ex-New Yorker was horrified to find Hollywoodians had a heathenish habit of getting up to go to work at five o'clock in the morning. Groping his way into his costume and gargling a quick cup of coffee, Charles managed to hop into the company's motorboat just as it was leaving the hotel pier.

On one side of the lake, MGM had lavishly erected an entire Civil War village. At sight of it, Mr. Coburn was really inpressed with his new calling. Here was a stage of a size to demand an actor's biggest talents. The village was a half mile square—Charlie knows, because he tramped its length and breadth many times that day, waiting for Director Brown to signal him to go into his act. At three o'clock that afternoon, Mr. Coburn made his debut before the cameras. He was one of a crowd who had the backs of their heads photographed as they watched a steamboat depart!

DR. PIERRE'S BORO PHENO FORM

"It was then," he says, "that I formed my entire philosophy and creed for a motion picture actor: Thou shalt have infinite patience!"

The creed stood him in good stead when making "My Kingdom for a Cook." In his first starring vehicle he plays a sort of British cousin to Mr. Dingle, a white bearded English author who out-Shaws the great Bernard in his meddling with international and domestic relations. The filming of the story required him to run the gamut of his personal emotions from "Ouch!" to "Ooof!" In the action he was kicked down a subway stairs, trampled, and crowned with an irate lady's umbrella. He received hot flapjacks in his face in one scene, and rode a motorcycle in another.

Considering that Mr. Coburn is sixty-six years old, with a poundage to match, and that he used no doubles for the many rehearsals and takes, a passage of dialogue in the film takes on a double significance:

"To what," he is asked, "do you attribute your long life?"

"To the fact that I haven't yet died!" he answers crustily.

Charles Coburn's private life—what there is of it—is spent mostly on the golf links and in his Sunset Strip apartment. He has been a widower for some years. The day this writer visited the apartment it was filled mostly with pipes and telephone wires, with assorted males at the end of each. The pipe smokers were fellow members of the Masquers Club, with whom he was plotting a special entertainment session. The telephone men were attempting to solve the traffic jam on two phones by adding a third instrument.

The serious side of Charles Coburn, of course, is his belief in acting as a profession, his love and faith in the theater and its newer form, the screen. The story of his Mohawk Drama Festival and Institute, founded at Union College in Schenectady, New York, in 1935, would make a long article in itself. Colleges all over the country are considering his teaching methods for regular dramatic classes after the war.

He is against present college dramatic methods in which he contends, "Amateurs turn out more amateurs." His pupils act with trained actors from the very beginning, for acting comes, he believes, not from books but from actual practice. The actor's real job, says Mr. Coburn, is to make his audience act. None of an actor's emotional display is any good if it does not release the emotions of his audience. He is only the instrument through which the spectator can enjoy the vicarious thrill of loving, hating, and laughing, adventuring in tragedy or romance.

Forsaking the abstract for the concrete example at hand, all we can say is that if Mr. Coburn's methods will bring us a new and unending supply of Dingles—we're for it!

LION'S ROAR
TWENTY YEARS OF LEADERSHIP
1924-1944
MGM

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

This is our Twenty Year Anniversary.

★ ★ ★ ★

M-G-M was born in 1924. The bells were ringing, the birds were singing and the faint roar of a lion was heard in the nursery.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is a cause for celebration, they tell us. The greatest gesture towards the entertaining of humanity is symbolized in those three little letters M-G-M.

★ ★ ★ ★

The stars that have risen from the Culver City studios form a constellation, the like of which has never embellished a trade mark.

★ ★ ★ ★

The Big Parade, The Merry Widow, Ben-Hur, Trader Horn, Grand Hotel, Mutiny on The Bounty, San Francisco, The Good Earth, Boys Town, Gone With The Wind, Mrs. Miniver, Random Harvest, Madame Curie—all and many more were released under the M-G-M aegis.

★ ★ ★ ★

Truly an anniversary to celebrate.

★ ★ ★ ★

And the celebration will reach its flower in June's end when almost every theatre in the land—every theatre—will play some film produced by M-G-M. Feature pictures and short subjects will be scattered onto the screens of all the houses.

★ ★ ★ ★

As part of the celebration, there will be displayed for first showing, a picture that literally required this twenty years of background to produce.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is "The White Cliffs of Dover".

★ ★ ★ ★

Directed by Clarence Brown, produced by Sidney Franklin, based on the poem by Alice Duer Miller, M-G-M presents—

★ ★ ★ ★

One of the greatest actresses of our time in her greatest performance—Irene Dunne.

★ ★ ★ ★

This story of love—Irene Dunne and Alan Marshal—is played on a background that clasps hands across the seas connecting, not dividing, America and England.

★ ★ ★ ★

The screen play by Claudine West, Jan Lustig and George Froeschel has skilfully translated this poem to the screen, intensifying its realistic drama, imparting a mightiness of action in purely screen terms.

★ ★ ★ ★

The poem remains, a thing apart, of great beauty. The film emerges as one of the most exciting emotional experiences the screen can provide.

★ ★ ★ ★

We're twenty and just a little shaver.

★ ★ ★ ★

Next year we'll be twenty-one!

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

AN ALL RIGHT GUY

One of the most misunderstood of Hollywood characters is Red Skelton. Definitely an okay guy. He can't resist clowning and he'll work for any audience, whether it's electricians on the set or service men he picks up on the corner.

It's Red's love life that is really the goon department. Apparently he can't be happy without his ex-wife Edna, nor happy with her. She always wrote Red's material and she still, after the divorce, is his business manager.

Meanwhile, Red's been dating the glamour cuties of Hollywood. They were all the same blonde, full-blown type. But it was pretty tough for him when he actually was ready to march to the altar with Muriel Morris to have her walk out on him.

Nobody seems to know just the reason for that, and Red least of all. He'll go into the army—and about that he's very glad, as he's long wanted to serve—still bewildered. Hollywood likes Red and hates to see this happening to him.

Danny Kaye's wife, Sylvia Fine, writes Danny's material, just as Edna Skelton writes Red's. Sylvia also manages most of Danny's career. But Danny says "Sylvia's got a fine head on my shoulders."

Maybe it's that humor about himself that will make Danny always a happy husband as well as a star. And maybe, being himself in the Army, and not a clown, Red will find some lasting rules for personal happiness. Hollywood hopes so.

LINE FORMS TO THE RIGHT

Poor Claudette Colbert is in hot water these days. She recently purchased Peyton Hall, smart Hollywood apartment house, complete with swimming pool and all. The minute it appeared in the papers who the new owner was, all her friends with friends arriving from the East called and asked her to get them an apartment.

Claudette, of course, under OPA ruling cannot rent an apartment to anyone. Under the ruling the only way she could get an apartment there herself is to move in and re-do it. The place is jammed full and there is no vacancy until next year.

WANTED: LARGE APARTMENT

Ann Sothern finally has sold her house and is moving into a small apartment. For the past year Ann has threatened to do this, but somehow never could make herself sell her dream house. Now she has sold it to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Schwartz. Mr. Schwartz is the producer of "Cover Girl," song writer of most of those songs that dance through your head. The move takes place whenever Ann can find an apartment large enough to fit her crystal chandelier that is the pride of her life. With the housing shortage, this will take some doing.

BOY GETS GIRL

For the records, Elyse Knox goes down as one of the frankest brides in a coon's age. Under duress from her studio she gave out interviews of her marriage to war hero and ex-football player Tom Harmon. Tom, under instructions from the War Department, could not talk of his wartime adventures and whenever a reporter tried to get any of them from bride Elyse they came up against a stone wall.

But the story of their romance is like a Hollywood script.

Cover girl Elyse participated in the ceremonies to greet the Michigan football team when they came to California in 1939. She met the hero Tom Harmon, thought he was very nice, and smiled when he said that someday he would marry her. Then Mr. Harmon made All-American and after his graduation from college was signed by Columbia Pictures to make "Harmon of Michigan". Again the two met and had dates, but Miss Elyse didn't take anything seriously.

Soon after Tom left California, Elyse married dashing Paul Hesse, cover photographer. Their romance didn't last and ended in divorce about a year later. Mr. Harmon by this time was in the Army and Elyse added him to her list of men in the service that she wrote to regularly. These she swears were friendly letters, such as one who would write to any friend at war. When Tom was reported missing in action she was genuinely upset, and when he came back she was overjoyed for him and for his family. Newspapers played up the romance angle, but to Elyse there wasn't any. Then off to war again for Tom and more letters. Then again he was missing and turned up again. This time Elyse met him in Chicago for a bond tour together. This time it was love.

Tom got the girl he had said he would marry and Elyse finally found the man she truly loves. Tom will report back to duty in a few months and she will continue her picture career until he comes back. Then there will be no more pictures, just Mrs. Tom Harmon.

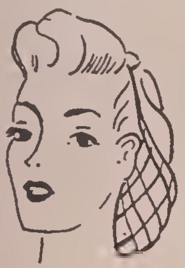
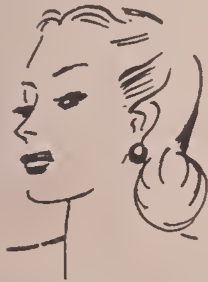
"COSMETICS CLOSE-UPS"

IT'S smart to be smooth under the summer sun. This year, to make it easy, hairstyling takes to highstyling. Sleek simplicity is the keynote; nets and knowing touches are the tricks of the trade. No more excuses for back-of-the-neck birds' nests. Sweep your locks up or under. But put a neat head on your shoulders and hold it high!

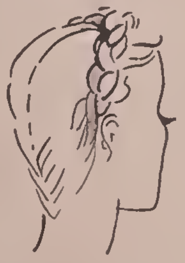
To be really smooth, of course, your hair must be shining. So keep it clean with a weekly shampoo and daily brisk brushwork.



Ends needn't be short to look slick. Long damp stragglers can be controlled completely if they are caught up in a colorful net. Bright hairnets, silky-thin or ropey-thick, are interesting costume accessories too, if they're chosen to match or contrast with summer prints.



Then, chignons are chic—and so very dramatic—especially with a center-parted coiffure. Cool, too, if the front hair is drawn softly back, leaving ears bare to the breezes. For evening excitement, try studding a chignon (true or false) with fresh fragrant flowers.



Braids make a backview that's simply bewitching. They bring a novel note to your beloved and oh-so-comfortable upsweep hair-do.

PIN UP GIRL (20th Century-Fox) capitalizes upon the latest survey of Hollywood's top money-making stars wherein the name of Betty Grable, (like that of Abou Ben Adhem) led all the rest. Part of the reason for her supremacy at the box-office is the tremendous following Betty has built up among the G.I. Joes who have named her one of the armed forces favorite pin-up girls. Therefore what could be more suitable than that her studio star Betty Grable in a Technicolor musical frankly labeled "Pin Up Girl?"

She might have been provided with a little better story than the flimsy plot that ties together these songs and dances. It is about nothing more important than a pair of girls who set out for Washington to take government jobs. En route they stop off in New York where they are mistaken for musical comedy stars and Betty meets a returned Naval hero with whom she falls in love. The rest of the yarn concerns their misunderstandings before true love triumphs.

But "Pin Up Girl" has at least eight hit tunes by Mack Gordon and James Monaco, some engaging dance routines, spectacular specialties by the roller-skating Vanities troupe, the Condos brothers and sweet-trumpeting Charlie Spivak and his orchestra. It also has Martha Raye and Joe E. Brown who have but recently returned from overseas entertainment tours of the fighting fronts, and consequently are held in high regard by American troops. Very good as Betty's good friend is Dorothea Kent, her hair reddened for contrast to the Grable blondeness, John Harvey is the Naval hero, and Dave Willock swell as his sidekick.

MEET THE PEOPLE (MGM) bears small resemblance to the stage revue from which it obtained its name. A story has been added that points, yet never attains, an attitude of social significance a la "Pins and Needles." The oft-used backstage locale divides interest with the currently favored setting of a war plant where local and professional talent are whipping up a show. About the only novelty is provided by making it a shipyard instead of an airplane factory. The rest of the musical ingredients are standard.

Lucille Ball and Dick Powell do what they can with the romantic thread. Virginia O'Brien, June Allyson, Vaughan Monroe and orchestra, and Spike Jones and his City Slickers take care of added musical chores. Bert Lahr finds himself washed out after they have gotten a single parody song out of him. Consequently you meet these people at your own risk.

TAMPICO (20th Century-Fox) is one of those hard-bitter adventure melodramas which may please those who do not expect too much of it. Edward G. Robinson plays a Merchant Marine captain whose ship is torpedoed by the enemy. Acting on the assumption that the sinking is traceable to Nazi waterfront agents, the captain seeks revenge. Victor McLaglen is his second officer, and the flashing Lynn Bari the girl who might have been guilty but—surprise, surprise—isn't.

HER PRIMITIVE MAN (Universal) starts out to be a very funny picture of the wacky sort. Then it grows tired of its own insanities and ends up by tiring you. Robert Paige, wanting to get even with Louise Allbritton for exposing a literary hoax, masquerades as a Lupari headhunter, so that he can embarrass her in her study of a primitive man's reactions to civilization. The supporting cast, headed by Robert Benchley, Edward Everett Horton and Helen Broderick, stays in there pitching.

COBRA WOMAN (Universal) serves merely as another excuse to parade the visual charms of Maria Montez in an exotic setting. She plays twin sisters, one good and one evil, who struggle over the island throne of snake worshippers. Jon Hall and Sabu are again her co-stars, the Hindu boy in a last appearance before joining the U. S. Army Air Force.

GUIDE

ANDY HARDY'S BLONDE TROUBLE (MGM) turns out to be twins who are the attractive Lee and Lynn Wilde. As you remember, the previous Hardy Family film ended with Andy aboard a train headed for his first year in college at his father's Alma Mater. He began a flirtation with a girl who was recognizable as Susan Peters. Somewhere along the line Susan must have changed trains, without doubt to a faster one, for she is no longer on the scene when Andy allows his roving eye to catch that of Bonita Granville. Then begins a pursuit of the aforementioned Wilde twins, whom Andy believes are one and the same girl.

As Hardy Family pictures go, this is probably the weakest one in the series. Not enough happens to Andy in college to give matters an expected bounce. Mickey Rooney is held down to a single situation which is not very bright, despite his best efforts to keep it amusing. So we have to go back to Carvel to pick up Lewis Stone as the Judge and Fay Holden as Mrs. Hardy. They have some business in disposing of Andy's jalopy to the courteous Chinese doctor who is Keye Luke. He is also a mechanical genius and proves it by making the heap run. Meanwhile, the able Herbert Marshall as a college dean is trying to help Mickey out of his double blonde trouble. It just isn't as funny as it should have been been.

AND THE ANGELS SING (Paramount) vainly tries to be entertaining about the misadventures of a quartette of sisters who vocalize well together but whose ambitions are respectively to follow careers as

Plan TO GET SOME Sun

BY SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

THERE are few girls who always burn but never tan! Our authority is Miss Ann Blyth, youngest pride of Universal Pictures. Ann recently left New York's footlights for Hollywood's sunny splendor. Climatically, she went through just what many of us do when we come out of steamheated homes into the searing summer sun.

This is her plan—to take to the sun; but to take advantage of it. She doesn't aim for a mahogany hue; but she does believe in bronzing a bit.

Before bathing or badminton, Ann applies a sun-filtering lotion (very necessary for her fair Irish skin). Frequent applications shut the burning rays out, let the vitamins in.

All-over rubs with hand lotion after outdoor exposure replace dried-out natural moisture. Lavish applications of emollient cream soothe and soften her wind-whipped face. The result—a golden glow. The kind that you and I can have, if we plan to get some sun.

Don't take my word for it! Watch Ann Blyth in "The Merry Monahans" and see what sun with sense can do—even to the sensitive.

With protection on your program, you'll be tinted to taste, with a tan that's really tonic.

Not a speck of skin surface can be left unprotected from sun. Or neglected after outdoor exposure!

Play is part of the perfect plan for every healthy, slim-trim body. So get your fun—but make it work for a better figure too.

Anti-sun stroking: this is the proper procedure for tanning without any pain or peel. Special lotion shuts out the rays that burn.

Taking chances on outdoor-dry skin lines? Not Ann! After sunning, she smoothes her pretty face with a film of emollient cream.

Betty's Baby

SHE was ushered into this world in the dark hours that precede the sunlit California dawn . . . Victoria Elizabeth James . . . Betty's baby . . . seven pounds, ten ounces . . . blue eyes, blonde hair . . . just like her glamorous mother. Harry James had paced the floor of the Father's Room at Cedars of Lebanon Hospital for hours . . . and when the doctor said, "You can see her now" Harry rushed to Betty's side. Her first words were, "Honey, you aren't disappointed are you?" And he replied, "Disappointed? Baby, I wanted a little girl all the time." Can you blame him after seeing these first pictures of Hollywood's newest starlet?

WHAT'S WRONG WITH MARRIAGE

Small Cheryl Christina Crane, affectionately known as "Cherry" to her glamorous mom and dad. The perfect addition to what was once considered a perfect marriage.

WHAT'S wrong with marriage in Hollywood? Why is it that next to war and taxes, there is nothing so sure to hit the headlines at dependable intervals as a new skirmish on the Hollywood domestic front?

To be up-to-date and specific, what happened—after five years of idyllic companionship—to cause a rift in the Brian Aherne-Joan Fontaine union? Its principals contend that the subject is "too painful even to talk about". And why, with the printers' ink scarcely dry on avowals of recaptured happiness by Lana Turner and Steven Crane, did the whole thing go off again like a delayed-action bomb?

We-ll, these aren't private questions—anybody can get in with the answers, providing they know them. Meantime, those of us who sit in the spectators' row are free to create our own version of the truth, and its consequences.

As this writer sees it, there is nothing wrong with marriage in Hollywood that isn't wrong with marriage anywhere else. Marriage is the too close confinement of two people who, because of their love for each other, try to think, act and feel alike. They're not always successful at it because, in the same way that no two humans' fingerprints are the same, minds and emotions are apt to have highly individual whorls and convolutions.

Marriage, as an institution, is a great deal like democracy—full of soft spots and imperfections. But, like democracy, it is worth fighting to keep, simply because it is so much finer than any other form of human relationship the world has yet been able to devise. And in spite of the frequent front-page splash of some Hollywood marriage newly sunk, there is no reason to believe that a film colony husband and wife do not put up as brave a struggle in the pursuit and preservation of their happiness as a couple in any other city.

The plain truth of it is that the state of California, in HOLLYWOOD?

BY DOROTHY DEERE

Behind the news comments on what has upset the five years' happy Joan Fontaine-Brian Aherne love story, and an inside what-goes with the new Lana Turner and Steve Crane romance rift which for news purposes is bounded on all sides by Hollywood, actually has a much more respectable divorce rate than many other states in the union. From the Federal Department of Foreign and Domestic Commerce come some statistics that are surprising.

Figures compiled in 1940 show that 2 percent of the entire population of the United States secured divorces during that year. California's divorce rate, based on its population, was 3.5, which for a moment might seem to indicate the glamour state was way ahead of its share of legal separations. On the other hand, Florida came through with a plump 5.9, the comparatively unsophisticated states of Texas and Oklahoma stacked up 4.3 and 4.2 respectively, and the state of Washington topped the Western coastline with 3.7.

Whether the government became discouraged with these figures, or has simply busied itself with matters more important, is not known. But there has been no official check-up since 1940. However, the conditions today are the same as they were four years ago. In Deland, Florida, and in Yakima, Washington, and Wichita Falls, Texas, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Dokes are allowed to go quietly about their personal troubles, but Mr. and Mrs. Screen Star, living their gold-fish bowl existence in Hollywood, enjoy no such privacy.

Any attempt to analyze the Aherne-Fontaine or Turner-Crane split-ups must be based on purely personal opinion—but there are certain facts with which to substantiate these opinions. In Yakima, or in Wichita Falls, those facts would be facts known only to a few close friends and neighbors. In Hollywood, they are town property.

When Brian Aherne married Joan, he was one of the film colony's most dashing eligibles—well established as Katharine Cornell's favorite partner for stage romance, and portrayer of such colorful screen roles as "The Great Garrick" and "Captain Fury." Joan was known mostly as the rather "plain" little sister of Olivia de Havilland. In fact, it was the more vivid 'Livvy' whom the tall young Englishman had first come acourtin'. He and Joan first struck sparks at a garden party, where they met by coincidence, and people were more or less surprised when they married.

The Ahernes lived unpretentiously, in a medium-sized Beverly Hills house that would never be picked as a "movie star" home. Joan, who was born in Japan of English parents, and Englishman Brian shared a Continental background and found it a good background for similar tastes in reading, conversation and other pleasures of quiet living. They never made any attempt to become members-in-good-standing of the cafe set, but preferred instead to entertain close friends in their home.

Brian, while endowed with a good bit of British reserve, is an easy-going fellow, a brilliant raconteur, with a solid strain of humor flashing behind his very blue eyes. His hobbies before the war ran to piloting his bride in his own plane on cross-country trips, and whipping remote mountain streams with a trout rod. These days, he likes to spend his spare time at his date and alfalfa ranch just outside of Palm Springs, and return to the movie sets tanned and relaxed.

Joan, fragile in her childhood, seemed to gain enjoyment from these slightly rugged activities. There is no question but that this marriage was, for awhile at least, extremely beneficial for the quiet girl who, with a new sprinkling of freckles across her nose and a very obvious happiness in her eyes, took on a new sparkle to her personality.

Meantime, the public status of the two underwent a gradual change. The just slightly-known young actress became an overnight star in "Rebecca", and eventually brought home a golden Oscar to decorate her side of the family mantel. As her roles become increasingly spectacular and important, her husband's screen career lost color. In the last couple of years, Aherne has suffered from the dull fate which seems to overtake actors who prove themselves so adaptable they can be shoved into any spot to furnish a dependable foil for a co-star's comedy or drama.

Today, Joan Fontaine is one of the screen's top dramatic actresses, being rushed from one news-worthy vehicle to another. And if there is any actor in Hollywood in immediate need of a good, meaty, picturesque role to revive his very fine talents, it is Brian Aherne. Whether this changed standing has made any real difference in their private relationship can only be guessed at, but it's a fair bet that the situation has added its share of emotional strain.

In Yakima, Washington, Joe Dokes might find it irritating if Mrs. Dokes suddenly got herself a more important job than his own, but in Hollywood the thing can be downright awkward. At Columbia, Brian's home studio, there is an unspoken rule that publicity stories on Brian must be written on subjects other than those concerning his wife, lest when they hit the paper they turn out to be Joan Fontaine stories. When making a picture, Aherne is pleasantly cooperative, yet he is apt to sit quietly pulling on his pipe, his blue eyes reflective, and say, "Well—after all—what can you write on me? I'm just a happily married fellow, leading a settled sort of life. The only kind of hey-hey I pitch is alfalfa. How are you going to make any exciting gossip out of that?"

When Brian began work in Columbia's "What A Woman," the occasion was marked by a large basket of roses, with a congratulatory message from Joan—an old Hollywood custom between mates in the acting profession. Conversation in the dressing room, where the roses were prominently displayed, was largely motivated by Brian's unrestrained enthusiasm for his wife's recently premiered interpretation of "The Constant Nymph."

"She did do a splendid job of it, didn't she?" he would remark with pride.

Mutual esteem would seem to be a solid basis for contentment in any marriage. But then again, there was the day when a soldier, visiting the set on a USO tour, approached the actor and with some excitement asked, "Say—are you married to Joan Fontaine?" Being answered in the affirmative, he continued,—"And that makes you Olivia de Havilland's brother-in-law, doesn't it? Sa-ay, can I have your autograph?" With a good-natured grin, Aherne took a piece of paper and solemnly inscribed, "Regards, and the very best of luck—from Joan Fontaine's Husband and Olivia de Havilland's Brother-in-law."

It developed later that the soldier was the son of a woman who had been the two sisters' nurse in their childhood, but the incident continued to be a favorite story with its victim, who repeated it to others on the set.

Outside the home, at least, Aherne gets a nice red mark for good sportsmanship. The case is not so good for Joan. There have been rumored feuds with fellow players. Some of her leading men have been known to make emphatic comment on the completion of a picture, saying they would not care to repeat the experience. It's an oft-proven truth, however, that the higher you rise in any business, the better target you present. And in all fairness to the Fontaine it is well to remember that pot-shotting is a favorite Hollywood sport. To mix a metaphor, however, it must also be remembered that two birds can be hit with the same pot-shot.

For many months a certain prominent columnist refused to take any item on Brian Aherne unless she could give it an unfavorable twist. Her reason was not a dislike of the actor, but rather that he persisted in misunderstanding her feud with his wife—for which the columnist had a quite justifiable basis.

These are the public facts. The private ones, whatever they may be, added up for a while at least, to a sum of mutual understanding and love between this Movietown Mr. and Mrs. The Ahernes, along with you'd be surprised how many other cinema couples, have long regretted the childless state of their marriage. It may be that a small Aherne might have added new interest to this marriage—and then again, it might not have made a difference.

The only sure conclusion is that for five years these two had something very precious between them, and there's no question but that they made a gallant effort to preserve it. The same is undoubtedly true of Lana Turner and Steve Crane, whose marriage, divorce, remarriage, and current separation have exploded into print with the spectacular rapidity of a string of firecrackers.

Steven Crane (as told to Movieland for its February issue) first saw Lana in person in Chicago. "We didn't meet then," he recalls, "but after all, you don't see a girl as beautiful as that many times in a life-time, so I didn't forget her. Then, after I came to Hollywood I'd see her at the West Side Tennis Club, the Palladium and around—

"Funny thing, we never met formally. I don't remember that anyone ever said 'Miss Turner, this is Mr. Crane.' Considering that, in all my life, nothing as important ever happened to me, it is odd that I can't remember just when, or where, or how, we did get together—but that naturally, as if it were intended, we did. I believe it was intended."

Hollywood itself, first "saw" young Crane when he began showing up as the lovely Lana's escort. The little Turner, with her beauty, her talent, her flair for sudden loving—or leaving—has always been a prime romantic item. There had been goodlooking attorney Greg Bautzer, who found himself with a broken engagement on his hands when she suddenly (Continued on page 88)

ROBERT WALKER

BY FREDDA DUDLEY

Being Part One of the personal history of a fast rising young comedy star

SO you're worried about Junior? He brings home a report card, you say, that reads like Charlie McCarthy's average weekly allowance after deductions for window breakage, mumbly-peg losses, and income tax.

Junior spends most of his school hours in the principal's office; he runs away at the slightest provocation; he is shy, moody, unpredictable. Your closest neighbor insists that he is a drip from the brow of Satan.

Cheer up. He is undoubtedly a genius and will grow up to bring fame and fortune to your family. Like, for instance, Robert Walker.

You surely remember the brilliant characterization that made the sailor in "Bataan" an unforgettable boy? That was the work of Bob Walker. Surely you have been among the millions laughing at the side-splitting comedy, "See Here, Private Hargrove." That reluctant convert to khaki was this same Bob Walker in the title role.

Bob was born in Salt Lake City, the youngest member of a quartet of Walker sons. Reading from bass to tenor, the boys were Wayne, Walter (currently an army major in North Africa and in former times Bob's champion and confidant), Richard, and Robert.

Bob was knee-high to a Sunday edition of your favorite paper when his family moved to Ogden where Bob's father became affiliated with a bank. Ogden was not so much a home for Bob as it was an embarkation point. At the age of seven, being unable to sleep because of the sparkling rush of gypsy blood through his veins, Master Robert took a blanket from his bed, climbed out of the window, and slunk mysteriously to the barn, keeping to the enveloping shadows cast by incidental buildings and clumps of trees. Once in the barn, Bob climbed to the hayloft, spread his blanket, and went to sleep. This made him a tramp, junior grade.

Thereafter, he explored every remote corner of his home—frequently on school time, which made a great many people very, very unhappy. Bob tried to explain that keeping him cooped up was like trying to catch quicksilver on a fork. Life was continually wonderful and terrible to him; wonderful in his moments of mad discovery and exploration; terrible in those moments when he had to take the punishment for this adventuresome spirit.

Therefore, he went through that phase most adolescents hit at sometime or another—the running away period.

When Bob was a gangling character of thirteen, he and a boy friend hopped a freight and bummed their way south, heading for Los Angeles. The first person they met was a cordial (Continued on page 61)

Personal tragedy—the loss of his brilliant wife, Jennifer Jones—and personal triumph, his overnight hit in Hollywood place Robert Walker in a unique position. The MGM studio regards him as their most brilliant recent discovery.

Here are the closest girl friends in Hollywood, two first magnitude stars who are always together, whether at some sports event, as here, or whatever their careers demand.

My PAL Paulette

by JINX FALKENBURG

Here's the finest story you ever read (as told by her best friend) about the girl on Movieland's cover.

I CAN'T think of any happier time to be asked to talk about my pal Paulette than when she is off on an overseas camp tour, and too busy to interrupt me. Conversation, when we're together, is a sort of perpetual marathon, with both of us sitting on the edges of our chairs, ready to grab the subject and run the minute the other stops to draw a breath—or so I've been told by people who sat around hopefully trying to get in a word of their own.

Anyhow, if this is talking behind a pal's back, I'm going to love it. . . .

Friendship, I think, is swellest when it springs from a seed of circumstance and just sort of grows up by itself, uncultivated and uncoaxed. Ours had it beginning when a Los Angeles Tennis Club staged a tournament and made up its teams by pairing a tennis player and a movie star to play in the doubles. To this day—and that was about seven years ago—I can remember the thrill when I saw my name posted on the bulletin board along with Paulette Goddard's. To me, a Kleig light was still just a word I'd read in movie magazines, but Paulette was already covered with glamour as Charlie Chaplin's leading lady. I had seen her around the club and wondered if someday, somehow, I might get a chance to meet her.

I remember how I rushed home that day, practically kicked in the back door and bounced through the house yelling, "Mother—Dad—everybody—isn't it exciting? I'm going to play the doubles with Paulette Goddard!"

No sooner had I made my amazing announcement than the depression set in. Maybe Paulette wouldn't want to play with me—maybe, being a movie star, she'd be haughty and insist on someone more impressive for a partner. I was afraid to look at the bulletin board the next day, expecting any minute to see the names changed.

Next afternoon, as Mickey, my mother, tells it, she went through her second whirlwind. She was sitting on the club porch knitting, when someone with a lot of brown hair and a lot of blue eye, tore up to her.

"Isn't it thrilling?" she said, "I'm going to play the tournament with Jinx—unless, well, do you suppose she'd rather have someone else for a partner?"

It was Paulette, of course, and she said she and her mother had been dying to meet me and my mother. Well, maybe we two didn't do the most brilliant playing in that tournament, but it's a cinch no one had any more fun that we did. Dad shot color films of the match, and Paulette came up to the house to see them—and anyhow, that's how it began.

The most exhilarating thing about Paulette, of course, is her capacity for enjoyment of everyday things—a meal, a date, a color, a dress, a hike, a swim, a joke, just an ordinary evening spent studying scripts and eating apples becomes important under the Goddard treatment. She is one of the gayest people you'll ever encounter. When you first meet her you're apt to think, "No one could possibly be that happy, all the time——" After a while you catch on she's the kind of person who hides her real feelings—what I mean is that the time something's really bothering her is the time she makes an extra attempt not to let anyone else be distressed by it. The thing that keeps on astonishing you, as long as you know her, is that underneath this seemingly casual exterior is a mind that works like a clock.

Paulette believes if anything is worth doing at all, it's worth making an event of. Other glamour gals may face a radio audience, for instance, with a shiny nose and wearing a little sports number wilted by hours of pre-broadcast rehearsal. She arrives at the studio (1) spic and span for rehearsal and (2) carrying a completely packed suitcase. In it is a formal gown, matching jewels, flowers for her hair, and a fur wrap for her "mike" appearance. The listening audience may not be able to get the full effect, but that small "looking" audience in the studio is going to see something pretty terrific.

Jinx Falkenburg proves that her pal, Paulette, isn't the only hair-style setter in Hollywood. From Mexico, Jinx borrowed this gay, warm-weather hair style: bright colored wool braided right into the glamorous star's alluring locks.

Recently the Falkenburg tribe, my mother, two brothers and myself, played a benefit tennis match for the Red Cross in Dallas, Texas, with Paulette acting as guest score-keeper. We went into conference—my kid brothers adore her, by the way—and planned special costumes. We reasoned that not all the spectators attending would be sport fans, but some of them would be people who were just contributing to a good cause, and Paulette thought they ought to get a good show for their money. Instead of regulation tennis whites, it was decided I should wear a red Tyrolean shorts outfit, but believe me, it was Goddard who really made history. The high-lights of her score-keeper's outfit were black velvet shorts with sequins, a white satin blouse, and white carnations in her hair.

We both have a passion for bright red or all-white, you know, and have to take turns wearing it. If we didn't plan ahead when going places together, we'd probably wear the same thing and show up looking like a forest fire, or a blinding snow storm. Sometimes the combination works out very happily. Christmas Eve at the Masquers' service-men's party, I wore red with white, she wore white with red, and we both felt very Christmasy. I especially wanted to mention this party, because it'll show you some of the things I mean about Goddard. Holiday nights aren't too easy to "sell" to a lot of stars, because like other people they have plans of their own. Paulette specially wanted to spend her evening with the service men, (Continued on page 85)

How a COVER is Born

Here you see Movieland's cover in the making. A few moments later Tom Kelley's camera clicked—that's how Movieland's cover was born.

SEE that cute shot of Goddard on our cover this issue? Do you think we just called up Paulette, shooed her over to Tom Kelley's studio, that Tom moved a couple of lights, snapped that one-shot color camera of his and that was it?

Yuk, yuk, yuk, are you innocent? There's much more in any cover that meets a million eyes. Like this, for instance.

You start, first, by co-ordinating Miss Goddard's free time and Mr. K's. Then you decide on the theme of the cover. Because of the new war bond drive, we wanted to work out something with bonds and stamps. That's when Missy Goddard got going into high. She consulted her hairdresser, Hedvig Mjorud.

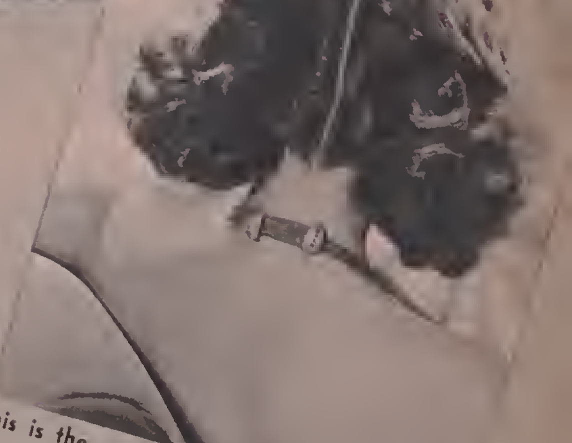
Movieland thought that was just dandy. The only thing was Paulette and Heddy were busy; so was Movieland's editor and the stamps had to be got. So Movieland wished this job on Lindsay Durand, a charmer in the publicity department of Paramount. Poor Lindsay is always getting things like this wished on her, maybe because she always comes through, no matter what the demand.

Miss Durand galloped away to AWVS only to discover that they had stopped making war-stamp corsages, but she tracked down the woman who had originally made them and came back with two corsages of the type that Paulette and Movieland now hope girls will want tó feature in their July patriotic hair-do.

So finally the appointment was set for a Tuesday at two. But at ten that morning, Paulette was at the Paramount make-up department having Heddy shampoo and set her hair. While her hair dried, the make-up man put on Paulette's camera face (which is no more beautiful than her natural own, we assure you). This took till one-thirty. Paulette grabbed a hasty sandwich and got to the Kelley doorstep right on time.

Then Tom's work began. He had to maneuver drapes and lights. Heddy put the final adjustment on the stamp corsages. Paulette changed costumes twice.

The back shot shows how the hair is center-parted, with the curls held forward by pins. It's cute; it's comfortable, and don't forget it's a mighty chic way to help our wonderful Uncle Sam.



This is the part of the hair style we couldn't show you on the cover—back view of Paulette's gargeous head and shoulders.

Ray and Mal are shown having fun together. They've been married for eleven happy years. Small Danny Milland will grow up to be even more handsome than his witty Dad.

BY DEE OFSTIE

The Romances of
RAY MILLAND

He learned about life from eleven ladies one of whom was the Queen of England!

IN "LADY IN THE DARK," Ray Milland tosses off some pretty snappy sarcasm having to do with the the wiles and weaknesses of women. In the catcher's box for the fair sex is Ginger Rogers (and, we might ask, who is fairer?), and for a few reels she really grabs herself some stingers.

The major difference between Milland in the film and in the flesh is his attitude toward the ladies. In private life, Ray is a fellow with an ingratiating sense of humor who doesn't need anyone to write his dialog. He has his own rakish thoughts on life in general, and can express them with even more charm than the camera catches. Like many California males, he is better in natural color than in photographic grays. A nicely sunned look shows his eyes a little bluer and his smile a little brighter than you're prepared for, and an occasional early gray hair makes the blackness of the rest of it even more authentic.

He has an inner gallantry that comes out something like this: "Women—they're wonderful!" Any man is the sum of the women he has known, Ray believes, and a man's life that hasn't been pretty well mile-stoned by the opposite sex is a life without direction or fullness.

This, then, is the summing up of Ray Milland, adding him up by his own standard of measure, on the basis of the women who have influenced his life.

He was Jack Mullane when he guarded England's Queen, and he was, as you can see quite a stout fellow. He made thirty-five dollars a week—and spent hundreds.

Ray Milland, whose current picture is Paramount's "Lady In the Dark" murmurs, "I'm a very fine fellow. My wife thinks so, which proves it."

"I'm a very fine fellow," says Ray, grinning. "My wife thinks so—and that proves it. She's a woman of charm and intelligence and character, and therefore her belief in me is my greatest asset. No one could ever make me completely lose confidence in myself. My wife found good in me, so it must be there."

You know, under all his kidding, that his beautiful wife is the most important person in the world to him.

But the other women who have contributed to his life run all the way from the family laundress, through Queen Mary of England, to Claudette Colbert of Paris and Hollywood.

The laundress takes precedence in his memory even over his mother. Ray was born in Neath, Wales, so rather unsurprisingly, the laundress was a Welshwoman. She was very fat. Her chief charm, since she smelt mostly of suds, and because she was bent over all the time so that Ray's not sure she even had a face, was that she allowed him to poke the fire under the huge pewter boiler.

"She made me feel like a man, even at that early age," he recalls. "She let me play with fire—a habit I've been following, figuratively at least, ever since."

His mother, he thinks, looked exactly like he does and when he was too young to be modest about such things, he decided she was very beautiful. His earliest recollection of her has to do with a swing she bought and placed him in. It was a self-propelling affair for self-efficient young men of three or four years, and the harder you pushed on a certain bar, the higher it flew. Ambitious even then, he soon was swinging so high that suddenly he had left the swing behind him. Results could have been disastrous, except that his mother's arms were there ready to catch him.

"I flew clear across the room, but I wasn't afraid because somehow I knew she'd be there. It might have taught me to leap without looking, but it didn't. Seriously, the greatest lesson a fellow learns from his mother is to appreciate those one or two people in his life he can always depend on."

The very first romance in his life was his school teacher. Her name, and Ray will never forget it, was Evelyn Davis, and it was definitely a case of love at first sight. She had large purple eyes and she dominated all his thoughts from the age of eight to eleven, since they went through four grades of school together. He was much too shy to ever bring her an apple, but his grasp of the three R's today is undoubtedly due to his great desire to please her.

BY RICHARD CONNELL

World famous for his humorous stories in top ranking publications, Richard Connell's heart and his typewriter now belong to Hollywood. Movieland is proud to add the name of Richard Connell to its list of famous contributors.

How to Write "An Original"

Second only to the number of people who want to act in movies are the number who want to write for them. Here is some highly unorthodox advice from a master craftsman

PAST my window walked a stately old Chinese in a mulberry robe. Then came a soulful Arab in a burnoose. Then two pretty girls in sheer black tights and spangled skirts, fully three and a half inches long.

All day, every day, a parade as strange, or stranger, passes my window. I am not a denizen of an opium den. What am I? And where? And, perhaps, why?

I'll shed a little more light. The Chinese was Walter Huston going to work in "Dragon Seed." The Arab was Ronald Colman en route to an ancient oriental palace (built yesterday) to dally with La Dietrich (in Technicolor) for the picture "Kismet." The two little girls in tights were June Allyson and Gloria DeHaven on their way to play a scene in "Two Sisters and a Sailor"; and I hope they know their lines, for I wrote them, with my collaborator, Gladys Lehman.

By now you must be getting warm. Here are a few more clues. The girl who just passed in a dress forty years out of style is Judy Garland, who is in "Meet Me in St. Louis," laid in 1904. There go Hedy Lamarr in skirts and Katharine Hepburn in slacks, and Spencer Tracy in trousers, and Mickey Rooney in a hurry——

You are right. My window is in a movie studio, the one whose pictures begin with a lion roaring at you. To let the lion out of the bag, the studio is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. And I am a writer there. There are, at M-G-M, 107 other writers. Their job is to make up the things you see and hear the actors and actresses doing and saying on the screen. No doubt you know this. But there are still some people who think the actors make up the pictures as they go along; and there are still some pictures which look as if they did.

I turn from my window to confer with Gladys Lehman about the new picture we are writing. She wrote "Little Miss Marker" which started Shirley Temple on her career; and "Back Street" (the old "Back Street") and dozens of other pictures. We did "Hired Wife" (with Rosalind Russell) together; and "Nice Girl" (with Deanna Durbin); and "Presenting Lily Mars" (with Judy Garland and Van Heflin).

The picture we are now bringing out of the everywhere into the here is a love story. It is called "Arrowhead Inn" or "The Thrill of Romance," or "Lost in the Woods," or "Can a Bride Fall in Love on Her Honeymoon—and Should She?" What the title will be when you (we hope) see the picture late this summer or fall sometime, we do not now know. Hollywood is a Land of Uncertainties. Before this picture gets to you there will be many changes. The title is about the last thing decided on. This is particularly true if the story is an "original," as this one is. An "original" is a picture story which is not based on a book (like "Dragon Seed") or a stage play (like "Kismet") or on a published short-story.

Now, what are your chances, John or Jane Doe of Nowhere, Ohio, of selling an "original" story to a studio? Dim, I'm sorry to say, very dim. And this is so, even if your story is a good one.

True, studios do buy some "originals"; but they are, nearly always, or in 99,999 cases out of 100,000, written by experienced screen-writers. Most originals are brewed, distilled and bottled on the premises by the hired hands—the regular, professional studio writers. They often start with an idea, a mere mouse of an idea, and develop it into an elephant; or, sometimes, into just a slightly larger mouse.

For this, writers are paid from fifty dollars a week to five thousand.

But pause, John or Jane Doe, before you hop a train to Hollywood.

There are already more than a thousand screen writers here now, and there are jobs for only about 400 of them at any one time.

So don't come here, John or Jane, unless you have a very great deal of patience—(Continued on page 81)

"Meet Me In St. Louis," which stars Judy Garland, is Mr. Cannell's newest film. Write a story about a little boy in Colonial times, advises our author, and you will be brought to Hollywood to write "Dracula's Mother-in-Law."

Mr. Connell, with Gladys Lehman, wrote "Two Sisters and a Sailor," starring Van Johnson, Gloria de Haven and June Allyson. He is astonished to discover that the finished picture is actually about two sisters and a sailor.

IF I WERE A POLITICIAN

By IRENE DUNNE

As told to Peter Sherwood

IRENE DUNNE remarked recently: "If I weren't a movie star, I would enter politics!"

Not, mind you, that Miss Dunne has thrown her glove into the political arena. She will tell you with a twinkle that her interest is merely a cusory and utterly feminine one. But she is a staunch believer that the professional woman of the stage and screen has a chance in politics.

"I think perhaps that the stage actress may have the edge," she told me. "For one thing, she is more mature. She is not necessarily more intelligent, or more gifted, but she has had more direct contact with the public. And while I think women are eminently suited to politics, I also know that those with a professional background will find that a great disadvantage toward earning the respect and confidence of the people. That will have to be overcome the hard way. She will have to prove that although she may be publicity-conscious, she is not publicity-wise. And that alone will take a lot of doing."

It was on a balmy spring afternoon in the panelled and flowered library of her tastefully decorated home in Holmby Hills that Miss Dunne talked with me of politics and people.

"To capture the spirit and backing of the American public is a matter of not only intelligence but great human, believable qualities," she said. "Naturally I feel there is no height to which a woman cannot rise in politics. A woman could be President, and a woman might make a better President (Continued on page 72)

Irene Dunne gives out with some very pertinent views

Irene could easily be a beautiful, efficient executive. As a matter of fact, besides running her household and her career, she also assists her husband in running great real estate and oil properties in California.

Irene Dunne's marriage to Dr. Francis Griffin is a truly happy one of many years' duration. One of their closest friends is ex-Postmaster General Jim Farley, who taught them a great deal about American politics.

After freelancing for years, and being as successful at it as her friend Cary Grant, who was inspired by her to follow the same system, Irene Dunne has now signed a long term contract with MGM. The wisdom of this move is evinced by the excellence of her first two pictures there, "A Guy Named Joe" and "The White Cliffs of Dover."

LOUISE ALLBRITTON

Born July 3

SO far 1944 has been full of surprises for Louise Allbritton. This star, born under the sign Cancer, is sensitive, full of reserve and yet intuitive. Her moon in Aquarius surprises her into contradictions, into wild streaks of independence and moments of impulsive action.

Louise has paid for her success with hard work and sacrifice. Her greatest difficulty, however, is to be fully understood and the fault is somewhat hers as she doesn't express her inner self to the world. Through driving ambition she knows that success may easily be lost in small ways.

She doesn't want that to happen to her. Since she has suffered through the temperament and lack of tact of others she is now learning to eradicate any possibility of these in herself.

Jupiter, squared to Uranus, opposed to Saturn, is not an easy configuration in any chart, but they are in her chart. These planets, all of slow movement and long duration, can be most crippling to real attainment to others of less will power.

Louise is fast learning how to cooperate, and therein lies her main road to success. With her Sun, Mercury and Jupiter in the emotional sign Cancer, she is very receptive and easily hurt.

It is her combination of spice, sparkle and intelligence which, now under control, is working FOR her. She will learn to allow her sense of humor and psychic intuitions freer play. She should not take herself too seriously.

Since she is not afraid of work, 1944 should bring her great success. A smash-hit role, though not an easy one, is likely to set her well on the road to security and much popularity. Courage is hers. Courage will be needed, and the year's end should bring her great happiness and whatever she herself has asked as a reward.

HOROSCOPES

Cancer, For those persons born between June 22 and July 22

THIS should be a happy and progressive year, for there are many chances to increase your position. Your popularity will amaze you as you are wise and keep clear of all gossip by never passing any on, and by carrying on your life in such a manner that no one can concoct gossip about you, your home or any of your business affairs.

Fulfill home duties as usual, but do not expect to retire, because this year brings expansion provided that you will overcome your natural timidity and develop a self-reliance which you possess.

You are apt to become the center of a storm, the all within a tornado, so build up faith in yourself and keep your conscience clear and your life an open book. Poise and indifference to what others think will naturally follow such a course, and the things you desire will emerge. Emerge with no effort on your part save that of inwardly knowing your rightness.

Romance seems certain, and there should be more than one choice. You seem settled in your choice, so allow obstacles to remove themselves. Take your time and admit nothing. Avoid overwork, for your energies will be taxed to their limit and there are many demands on your time. Let gossip fly as an ill-wind whistling by a closed window, and accept this year's great gifts with humility and wisdom.

FATHERS of HOLLYWOOD

Joe Yule, appearing with that chip off the old block, the ever-muggin' Mickey.

We showed you Hollywood mothers for Mother's Day

Robert Paige's father, veddy British, and retired from Britain's navy is proud of his son's place in movieland's hall of fame.

Proving what American upbringing and opportunities achieve: handsome George Montgomery and his foreign-born father, Mr. Letz.

Roddy McDowall is awfully proud of his father and he has a right to be, for dad's a First Officer in the British Merchant Marine.

Now here's a bevy of pappies who, for many years, bought the shoes of their now glamorous offspring.

This was taken on the day pretty Janet Blair's dad gave her away to Sgt. Busch.

Gloria DeHaven and father, Carter DeHaven, famous on stage and screen.

Eduardo Cansino was his daughter Rita's first dancing partner at the old Caliente.

Walter Withers and Jane. Those broad smiles tell the story of a happy family.

Judge Cooper used to pat Gary on the head without straining a ligament. Now look!

These two sorta like each other. It's Marguerite Chapman and her adoring dad.

Bing and his father, very much alike, even in the fact that they both have four sons.

Warner Bros. expect long-legged, beautiful young Alexis Smith to become one of their greatest stars. She made a brilliant debut in "Gentleman Jim" and followed it up with "The Constant Nymph"; but "The Adventures of Mark Twain" proves her talent authentic, her future brilliant.

Alexis Smith, Warner Bros. newest star, gets a week off between pictures. And spends a good part of this welcome rest period in the sun.

Why I'm Waiting Before Marrying

BY ALEXIS SMITH

As told to Marcia Daughtrey

Theirs started as a publicity romance—and became real love. But even before Craig Stevens went into the army youthful Alexis Smith refused to make a rush marriage.

THERE is no doubt in my mind that there are still a great many girls living in these United States who really prefer a long engagement, despite wartime pressure and the inclination to spontaneous marriage. I'm one of those.

Most girls are never called upon to discuss their marriage plans with any but their intimate friends, yet because I'm an actress (that has always sounded odd to me, and it sounded doubly odd when I had to tell a policeman my occupation the other day because I had overparked)—as I was saying, because I'm an actress, a great many people are interested—and thank goodness they are—in my reasons for not marrying just yet.

Craig Stevens and I have been engaged for well over a year. It's a wonderful state—I wouldn't have missed it for anything. We became engaged just before Craig went into service. We said at that time that we wouldn't marry until the war was over and we had some chance of setting up and maintaining a normal home, and we meant it.

After Craig had served a year he was given an honorable discharge—like thousands of other men who are now returning to their home towns—because of a rather serious physical condition. He will recover completely, of course, but it will take time and patience, because it is the recurrence of an old back injury.

The moment Craig returned to civies, dozens of people said, "Well, now, I suppose you two will soon be married." And when I answered that we wanted to wait for a number of reasons, most of the inquirers looked surprised.

One of the best reasons that Craig and I have agreed upon for waiting is that he has a number of adjustments to make to civilian life. Everyone has assured us—all the world loves a lover and (Continued on page 75)

Civilian Air Patrol instructor since Pearl Harbor, Bob is now training Army Air Force pilots.

Stubborn and Charming

...ROBERT CUMMINGS

Stubborn is Bob's word for himself. Upon reading his opinions on life, women and dogs, we think you will call him charming BREEZY. Bumptious. Informal as a gym shirt, and unpredictable as a champagne cork. That's Bob Cummings in person.

"Wonder what he (or she) is really like," is a thought that's been voiced by fans about their favorite stars ever since D. W. Griffith invented the first close-up. And in all those years, it suddenly strikes us, there has never been a star who more completely lived up to his screen personality than this same young Cummings.

Gun-man Cagney in reality is scared to death of fire arms; tough-guy Bogart's pet hobby is raising petunias; great-lover Boyer has been quietly wed to one woman for years; adventurer Gary Cooper is the sleepiest fellow on the lots; belligerent Pat O'Brien wouldn't slap a gal down if he had to. All of these are true facts, as expounded over and over again by movieland biographers.

In contrast, we doubt if there is much Cummings has performed before the cameras that he wouldn't duplicate in real life if his healthy young spirits so moved him. The headlong hero of "Princess O'Rourke," with his rash romanticism, his flair for fun and his clean-cut patriotism, is as good a running portrait of the real Bob as any you're apt to encounter. Likewise, the deep-thinking, seriously emotional young man of the recent "Flesh and Fantasy" is also more than a reasonable facsimile. Perhaps it's because, whatever the plot, Bob is essentially a normal young American on the screen—which is exactly what he is off it.

Putting this many-faceted fellow into words isn't an easy job. He doesn't care a lot for interviews.

"Seeing my remarks in print abashes me," is the way he puts it. "I have never been able to kid myself into thinking that anything Bob Cummings has thought up strictly for his own amazement is important enough to be spread around to thousands of other people.

"I'd never make a writer, I guess, because to me, even a best seller is still only one man's opinion."

On the other hand, he's amazingly cooperative, and his conversation, once started, is totally unlike the usual movie-actor's cautious talk. He never pulls a punch-line, nor muffles an answer. With one of the liveliest minds in Hollywood, he has a lot of very positive and pungent theories—and when he gets going on them all a reporter has to do is hang on to her chair and thank Heaven for a good strong writing arm.

His real life dialogue flows as refreshingly as any that was ever written for him. Romance, acting, flying, politics, dogs, diets, or himself—he'll give you an intelligent and highly individual theory on each.

For example: "Romance? There isn't any hard and set rules for it. A man doesn't stop to analyze just why he's falling in love with one particular woman. Emotion isn't a cold and calculated procedure—if either of them stops to get so darned intelligent about it they'll probably never get as far as real love."

Women? "There's something about a man that needs a woman to bolster his ego. If she insists on proving she's smarter than he is, she'll find herself way outside of his affections. A woman who beats him at golf, beats him at tennis, and maybe beats him at life, gives him an inferiority complex. He likes her to be intelligent enough to talk—but he appreciates it most when she listens. He wants her not too bold—but not too timid to learn the things he wants to teach her. Me, I think the most charming woman is a well balanced one."

Dogs? "They're a lot like people. Inevitably their innermost characteristic shows in their faces. Take Rodo, my bull dog. He's ugly as sin but he's managed to acquire a certain kindliness in his fat old jowls that lets you know he means you no harm. Countess, my police dog, has a patrician nose and tapered ears, but her morose nature shows in her eyes. She has been known to take meat, when offered it—in the shape of a hand."

Himself? "I'm the stubbornest guy in the world. I was born in Missouri and I can make that other native, the mule, look like a nice pliable creature. Just tell me I can't do anything, and it's practically done! My stubbornness is my weakness, but it's also my strength."

As a recently appointed Flight Instructor to the U.S. Army Air Force, however, Bob prefers planes to all other topics. He considers them a much safer subject than women, f'rinstance.

"After all," he grins, "there are only about two thousand things you must know about a plane and you can consider yourself a fair authority!"

His frankness has never been violated but once. That was when a certain male interviewer filled in his statements with some highly colored fabrications of his own.

"It came out with the title, 'The Lies and Loves of Robert Cummings'," the victim remembers, "and quoted me as saying my unstable character was inherited from my father, 'who once romanced a Baroness on the banks of the Danube'—or words to that effect. Since my Dad's whole life had been spent as a quiet, small town doctor in Joplin, you can imagine the time I had explaining the article to my very amazed mother!"

Much as he does on the screen, Bob makes friends with you—if he's going to—in ten minutes. If he doesn't, just don't bother waiting around. He's the sort of chap who calls you by your first name, and expects you to do the same. An invitation to "run out" to his five acre-ranchito in Ventura, California, includes a detailed description for getting there, plus a suggestion that you bring along a couple of friends to try out the swimming pool, plus the frank statement that he won't shave unless you insist.

Twice divorced, Bob is about to marry again. And this is the Cummings house, simple and unpretentious but so very much a home. Visitors welcome, and they love it.

Bob studies a picture script in the wood-paneled library of his Ventura ranch home. While waiting to be called to active service, he kept right on with his screen work.

CONTINUED

The Cummings menage is a rambling white house almost hidden by trees. Its driveway is entered by a gate which operates on the Cummings system for people who don't want to get out of their cars. There are four poles, two by the road and two inside the fence, and each is equipped with an ingenious system of cords and pulleys. The sign on the gate mistakingly read "Please Pull Cord" when delivered, and has stayed that way for laughs. You aim your car at a pole, hang the body heavily on the cord and, reluctantly, the gate opens. Ditto inside, and the gate closes. It's the kind of device most any fellow you know is always rigging up, and like theirs, it's only about twice as much work to operate as if you had climbed out of your car in the first place.

On the day we successfully maneuvered the aforementioned gate, the ranchito's owner was home on leave—a furlough which his joyous dogs seemed to think was especially arranged in their honor. The Army uniform he wears so jauntily had been temporarily hung on a peg in favor of swim trunks and a bathrobe, striped like a rainbow gone out of its mind. He's a completely unselfconscious host, even handsomer away from the cameras than in front of them, but willing to forget it if you will. His face is well tanned, and a generous white smile lets you know there's more where that one came from.

The walk to his charming, comfortably furnished ranch house leads past the garage, and if you don't mind, he'll stop a minute to see if that left front tire is holding up as it should. The house is cool, gracious with old wood and pewter, as pleasingly homelike to a stranger as it is to the fellow who takes you on a tour of inspection. In the master bedroom is a huge canopied bed with white candlewick spread.

"Hope you don't mind if it looks a little lumpy," he grins. "I made it up myself this morning. An Army man's pay is a little different than a movie star's—I've let the servants go."

The story of Bob's Army service is as good a word picture of his character as any you'll ever read. It began shortly after Pearl Harbor, when he announced to his studio and friends that he was placing himself on Army call. Since his acting career was at its high point, a lot of people wanted to know, "What's your hurry?"

With no apology for repetition since we think his words, like your dentist, should be seen once a year, we reprint some of the statements he gave interviewers then:

"If any possible good can come out of something as horrible as war," he said, "it's going to be the awakening of a lot of Americans to the fact that this country is not only worth taking from, but giving to. We've all enjoyed such darned good lives we haven't bothered to think about it much. We've just taken all our privileges for granted and kicked like steers when some little things went wrong."

The fact that Cummings once posed as an Englishman to get a start on the stage, and in the movies, is pretty well known. It was a fast and funny bit of deception, and it worked. When his country went to war, however, he made wry comment on that early masquerade.

"Only a jerk kid would have done it—no matter how hard the going was. At that age you don't know much about reverence or respect. Since then I have met and worked with people who came to this country from other places—Germany and Austria, for instance—who found the difference so great they almost wanted to get down on their knees and kiss our good old taken-for-granted American soil.

"I know now that being a United States citizen is something worth fighting for."

Ever since his teens, Bob felt at the time of these remarks that he practically had one foot in the sky. What no one guessed was that it would take a year and a half to get the other foot up alongside it. Being half in the Army and half out of it might have been an uncomfortable straddle for some fellows. But not for the Cummings character who, as we have chronicled, admits he's a very stubborn guy. At Home with the Alan Marshals

By CONSTANCE PALMER

OUTSIDE the stage at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer it was 99 degrees hot; on the set under the lights, the thermometer hit 120 and then stopped, having no place further to go.

Alan Marshal, playing a scene with Irene Dunne, was bundled up to the ears for winter—muffler, heavy duty overcoat, thick gloves. The action for "White Cliffs of Dover" ran its elegant, suave way.

Then the lights clicked out. Everybody sighed with relief. Marshal walked off the set, threw open the overcoat.

He had nothing on underneath but a pair of trunks.

That's what Alan's like—a study in contradiction.

You see him as a composed and serene man-of-the-world and then you discover that his favorite columnist is K. C. B. and that, in his early career on the stage, he tore about madly—complete in goggles and gauntlets—all over New York on a motorcycle bought with money he'd saved to take a trip to England.

You hear of his dining with circumspect aplomb on breast of guinea hen under glass at Perino's—and then you find out he's just as fond of hamburger laced with onion, is a nightly ice-box raider and a neat hand at flipping a flapjack.

As an actor, Alan Marshal is well equipped to play his first real leading role on the screen. He has had years of experience on the stage, where he served his apprenticeship with such masters as Fritz Lieber and George Arliss in Shakespearean drama.

Later on he played a year of stock in Montreal and Toronto, came to New York to be leading man for Margaret Anglin and, after that, for Frances Starr in "Lady Jane."

THE ALAN MARSHALS

Then followed "Michael and Mary," "Fool's Cap," "Berkeley Square," "The Royal Family," "Private Lives," "Best Sellers" and "On Stage" with Osgood Perkins.

Alan got the impression that he was rapidly getting nowhere, which gave rise to a nightmare listlessness. He dreams he is still in "Royal Family" and discovers to his horror that he is standing—completely nude—on a barrel in front of a crowded house.

In 1936 David O. Selznick saw and signed him for the picture "Garden of Allah." Alan thought this was it—that he was really set. He shortly discovered he was set—but in a very different manner than he had anticipated.

Selznick is known as one of the most astute showmen in the motion picture business. His judgment of star material, through his discovery of Vivian Leigh, Joan Fontaine, Ingrid Bergman and others, has been vindicated so many times that his very name seems to hold magic.

Selznick's keen eyes saw in Marshal a great deal that the screen could use. His sharp ears heard the beautifully modulated speaking voice, the clipped English diction, and his acute business sense told him that here was a good investment.

"Marshal," Selznick said when they discussed the contract, "you won't come into your own for perhaps ten years. You are the type of man who will be more attractive in maturity than in youth. And if you will follow my advice and be convinced that what I say is best for you, I am sure I can make you a star."

After "The Garden of Allah" was finished, Alan found himself receiving a generous weekly salary—and not much else. At times he was heartsick as he saw role after role for him turned down. But when he became restless, Selznick consoled him.

"Take it easy," he counselled. "You are still a young man. You're a good actor and you will become a better actor—not worse—with time. As I told you when I signed you, you will develop into a surer personality with maturity, because maturity becomes you. But you have the right roles only. Don't you worry—I'm not!"

To prove his good faith, Selznick kept picking up options on Alan's services for seven solid years. However, not all the seven years were spent in marking time. After "The Garden of Allah," in the next two years he did "After The Thin Man," "Parnell," "Night Must Fall" and "Conquest" at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and "I Met My Love Again" for Walter Wanger at Universal.

He had to wait until 1939 to make "Dramatic School" and "Women in White," again for M-G-M, "Invisible Enemy" for Republic, "The Road to Reno" for Universal, and "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" at 20th Century-Fox.

In 1940 he did only "Irene" for RKO-Radio and "He Stayed for Breakfast" for Columbia. In 1941, "Howards of Virginia" for Frank Lloyd and "Tom, Dick and Harry" for RKO. There was just one picture, "Lydia," in 1942—and "White Cliffs of Dover" is his only activity so far in 1943.

But if you will examine closely this rather short list of pictures which cover a seven-year period, you may glimpse the method used in planning Marshal's career. With the exception of "White Cliffs," he has never been a leading man on the screen. In all the other pictures he has played good parts, some more important than others, to be sure, but all actually secondary. Now, in "White Cliffs," he has reached a point in his planned career which will quite probably lead to actual stardom.

"I never thought of doing anything except acting," he said, when I asked how he felt about what had happened to him so far. "When I was a little boy I didn't long to be a fireman or a policeman or a cowboy. I just wanted to be an actor. My mother and father were actors in Australia and later here in the United States. I wasn't quite five when they came to this country, so they put me in boarding school because their tours were too long and hard for such a small child."

He joined them wherever they happened to be during his vacations and absorbed the atmosphere of backstage and stage people as an impressionable child would. At school he thought something of becoming an architect, then later of painting and still later, for a short time, of being an accomplished pianist.

But, one by one, these distractions dropped away from his main goal in life and he uses what he learned then only for his own amusement. Today he paints a bit, sketches when he feels like it, and runs over the classics on his piano as the mood strikes him.

"Possibly because my mother and father were so active on the stage while I was growing up," he explained, "I never felt it necessary to go to a dramatic school. The old saying, 'The best way to learn to act is to act' was good with them—and it was with me, too.

"When I was 15, I got a job—all on my own—with

"But it shows that just because a boy has had stage parents, he isn't an actor. That has to be learned the only way there is to learn—on the stage before a paying audience."

Although he was educated in American schools, he retains the clipped British accent learned from his parents. This is fortunate because his fine diction has been largely responsible for many of the parts he has played.

Gasoline rationing has seriously cut down his love of speed. As a matter of fact, like millions of others, he's practically grounded. But back in 1930, when he was playing in "Michael and Mary," he tore around New York on the motorcycle mentioned earlier, to and from the theater—and not getting many tickets because he went too fast.

Later, in 1938, he met Mary Grace Borel while she was visiting in Beverly Hills and—in a low-slung, custom-built model with the top down—practically scorched the road between there and San Francisco when she went back home. He made the trip not less than twice a week and always (Continued on page 80)

HAPPINESS IS A THING CALLED YOU

From the day of their first meeting right till these days when war separates them, Ronnie Reagan and Jane Wyman have known deepest, most completely shared happiness.

A beautiful war wife and mother gives her inspiring rules for courageous living

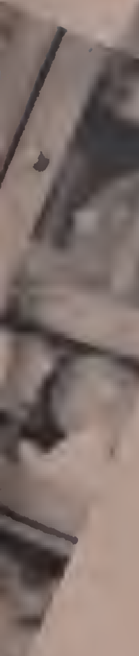
BY JANE WYMAN

As told to Helen Louise Walker

I THINK I started to learn about this right after that terrible party, when I was about fourteen. But I've gone on learning about this special, this very important thing right up to now. And I still have a great deal to learn about it. I guess everyone has and I guess no one ever learns all there is to know about it. . . . It has so much to do with happiness!

You see, I was a small, rather plain child. I had fractured a leg and it had left me with a limp and I never had the kind of clothes I wanted. I would have been proud of my hair which was "naturally curly,"

Here's Maureen, the third member of this perfect and eternal triangle. You can tell she'll grow up into a beauty; and by following her Mama's rules she'll also be a personality.

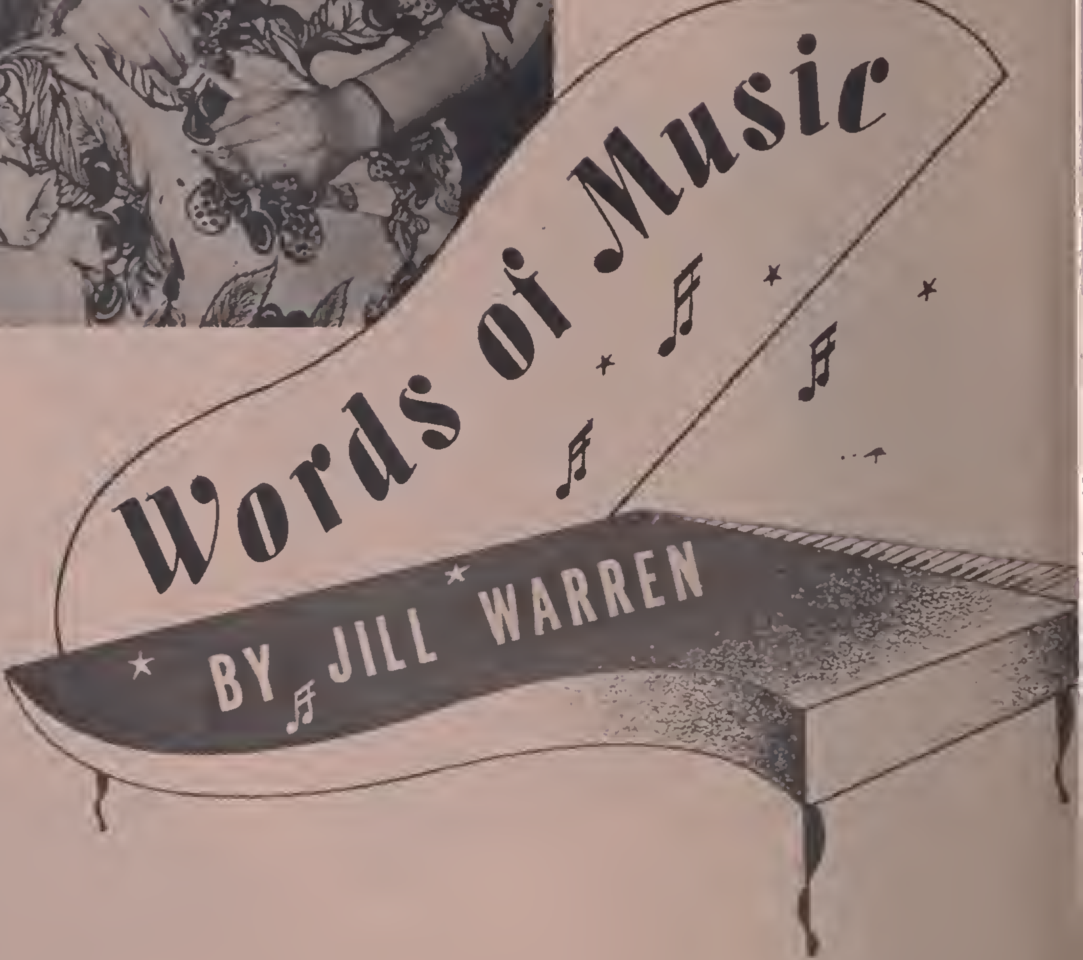


When you see Warner Bros.'—and Ronnie Reagan's—beautifully poised Jane Wyman today can you believe she was ever an awkward scared girl?

if my mother hadn't insisted that I have "sensible" haircuts which prevented any frivolous ringlets. I thought of myself as plain and awkward and drab. I used to imagine that the girls (and the boys, too) who passed me in the halls at school were whispering unkind things about me. They probably weren't paying the slightest attention to me! Never-the-less, that's what I thought about myself and that was why it seemed such a miracle when I, a sophomore, was invited to a senior class party.

I had my first professional hair-do and manicure at a real beauty shop and my mother sewed for days on the frock which I was sure would be a devastating success. We were "paired off" at the party. After my partner had danced with me, politely, once and disappeared no one else asked me to dance. I sat and sat and sat. And then I stole out through a side door and fled into the night. I crept home and went to bed and I didn't mention the party to anyone for weeks. It was considerate of my family that they didn't mention it to me, either. No one asked how it had gone or whether I had enjoyed (Continued on page 83)

Capt. Glenn Miller and Jill Warren smile pretty for the cameraman at one of Glenn's recent "I Sustain the Wings" broadcasts from New York.



Words of Music

BY JILL WARREN

GOOD day, children. Here is your jivin' Jill screaming at you from the big mad city of New York. I've been tearing around the town digging all the good stuff and with the exception of the couple of days I got lost in the crowd at a Sinatra broadcast, I don't think I missed too much. So if you care to take up pencils and make notes, I shall step to the podium and give out with a few thousand words:

My biggest musical thrill was seeing and hearing Capt. Glenn Miller and his terrific Army band. Glenn is stationed at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut, but he comes to New York every Saturday for his "I Sustain The Wings" broadcast over NBC. And let me tell you, you have never heard a large band swing like this one. It's really amazing when you consider that there are fifty men, including a twenty-two piece string section. But Miller, the master arranger, has done it. The orchestra sounds not unlike Glenn's civilian band, but so much fuller and greater. And you all remember that his old group was a bit of all right. It wouldn't surprise me to see Miller organize a big band similar to his Army aggregation after the war.

I attended Duke Ellington's opening at the New York Hurricane Restaurant, and it was sensational, to say the least. The place was packed with band leaders and singers who admire the Ellington talent, including Georgie Auld, The Andrews Sisters, and the new record sensation, Kay Armen. The band was fine, as usual, and I particularly enjoyed Johnny Hodges' wonderful alto solos. Wini Johnson, the Duke's new songstress, is as cute as a bug's ear, and although vocally she isn't up to Ivy Anderson, she makes up for it in appearance.

I spent another evening at Cafe Society Uptown listening to Mildred Bailey and Teddy Wilson. Mildred panicked the people with her jump arrangement of a little patriotic ditty called "Scrap Your Fat." I hadn't heard Wilson since he was in Hollywood about three years ago, but the guy is still great. There may be better band piainists, but for solo work there are few who can touch him.

You Benny Goodman followers will remember Lee Castaldo, who used to play trumpet with B.G. He has changed his name to Lee Castle and now has a band of his own, and a pretty good one at that. He is playing around New York and gunning for a big hotel spot. Lee plays a solid horn and has the looks and personality to make the grade as a leader. Incidentally, he is a disciple

The King Sisters, snapped with their "props" at the N. Y. Victor Recording Studios while waxing their latest, "Milkman Keep Those Bottles Quiet."

Here's Benny Goodman with a few of the boys on the set of Benny's picture for Twentieth Century-Fox, "Sweet and Lowdown." Probably the last shot you'll see of B. G. for a while—as a band leader.

Perry Como and his son Ronnie bid a mutual farewell to New York as his train leaves Grand Central Station. Perry was en route to Hollywood for his screen debut in "Something For the Boys. Ronnie came along just for the ride.

Duke Ellington, Jill Warren and David Street laugh it up together for one grand time at the Duke's New York opening at the popular Hurricane Restaurant.

of Louis Armstrong and owns every record Louis ever made.

Speaking of trumpet players, I saw Charlie Spivak just before he opened at the New York Paramount Theater. He was the happy kid because he is a father for the second time—another boy, Steven, at five and a half pounds. Jimmie Saunders is the new male vocalist with Charlie. You'll recall him with Harry James a couple of seasons back.

And was I surprised to see Bob Allen in the crooner's chair with Tommy Dorsey! Bob recently broke up his band because he was going into the Army. But he was rejected and the headache of reorganizing was too much, so Bob accepted Tommy's offer.

No, I didn't miss Fifty-Second Street, the avenue that really jumps. I happened to hit it on a Saturday night, and the music was solid, solid. I found Billie Holiday at the Onyx Club, with Oscar Pettiford's orchestra. Billie sounded fine, as always, and seemed happy singing with a small combo.

The most exciting spot was The Yacht Club, where I heard Billy Eckstine, a colored boy who really sings a song. He has been working solo, and very successfully so, since leaving the Earl Hines band. Billy might well be dubbed the "Sepia Sinatra." He was backed up by a swell five-piece outfit led by Trummie Young, ex-Charlie Barnet and Lunceford sideman. Young plays a whale of a trombone.

The Pennsylvania Hotel was on my list because I wanted to give a listen to Frankie Carle's new band. The Carle piano has never knocked me out, but I must say his orchestra is one of the best I heard in New York. They were well rehearsed, phrased excellently, and the brass

Impulsive Rebel

This is the story of Susanna Foster, whose honesty was misunderstood until she learned that little white lies are honestly fair

BY DORA ALBERT

When Susanna belonged to Paramount she looked like this, but she talked too much to the wrong people about the wrong things.

This was Susanna Foster when she was 12 years old, the unimportant property of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Now Susanna Foster is more aware and more wise. Under the leadership of Universal, she's making box-office progress toward the stardom she deserves.

"WHEN I was thirteen years old," said blonde, fragile-looking Susanna Foster, "everybody said I was a brat. I had opinions about practically everything and didn't need any coaxing to air them.

"I air my opinions just as freely now. But when you are nineteen and express opinions, people take it for intelligence. When you are thirteen, people don't think you have a right to opinions.

"But I had been on my own then for two years. I felt I had a right to say what I thought."

She said it. Loudly and thoroughly. She was Paramount's little problem child. They had signed her and were stuck with her. Sure, she had talent. But just the same, she was swiftly driving them mad.

Interviewers didn't know how to take her. When she sat down to lunch with people four times her age, she talked like a Quiz kid. When they stated their opinions, she stated hers. Or she talked first; she didn't care. If they disagreed with her, she (Continued on page 63)

GASLIGHT

WHEN stars of the calibre of Ingrid Bergman and Charles Boyer join forces to bring you a thriller, you are assured of an extraordinary picture. It grips and holds your interest from the moment that you become aware that the husband intends to drive his wife insane by psychological suggestion.

The period is the early 1880's. The tragedy of her aunt's mysterious murder has deeply touched a young girl. She leaves London to study singing on the Continent, only to give up her studies when she falls in love. Returning to live in the aunt's house, a subtle change begins in her husband's attitude. He plants the thought in her mind that she does not always know what she is doing, that she loses things, that her sanity is becoming impaired. It is a diabolical campaign to drive her to doing away with herself and the frantic woman is saved only by the timely intervention of the police, who have never been satisfied about the mystery of her aunt's demise.

Bergman is indescribably lovely as the wife, quite the youngest girl you have ever seen, in the prologue. Boyer's portrayal of the husband is a far cry from his usual romantics. His first villainous character, but a brilliant acting job. Joseph Cotten plays the Scotland Yard man, and Dame May Whitty adds a note of comedy as a busybody neighbor. A stunning debut is registered by Angela Landsbury as the Cockney maid. You can't miss "Gaslight."

THE HITLER GANG

PARADOXICALLY, Hitler asked for it when his Nazi propaganda machine ground out a film called "Oom Kruger," starring Emil Jannings, once a Paramount star before his talents were perverted under the Swastika. This lying picture was a bald-faced distortion of the facts of the Boer War which might be twisted to the discredit of the British. Looking at it gave the Paramount boys the idea of dramatically telling the truth about "The Hitler Gang." Thus came into being Hollywood's first fully authenticated review of contemporary history's blackest pages. It is "the inside story of an inside job by a gang that stole a nation," or as much of the story as could be told "with decency." Every scene has been substantiated by at least three reliable sources.

The role of Hitler is no novelty for Robert Watson. He has never, however, played Der Fuehrer with the complete seriousness which he now maintains for a compellingly powerful portrait. Appearing in all but two scenes of the picture, Watson's performance is one of the most exhausting in memory. No punches are pulled in revealing Hitler's unbalanced mind. Nor is anything left to imagination in depicting reasons behind his rise to power.

Splendid, indeed, are the portrayals of every member of the cast, led by Victor Varconi's Hess, Alexander Pope's Goering, Martin Kosleck's Goebbels, Luis Van Rooten's Himmler, and Reinhold Schunzel's Ludendorff, to mention only a few.

(Warner Bros.)

BETWEEN TWO WORLDS

SELDOM is a second filming of an early success successful. That "Between Two Worlds," formerly known on the stage and screen as "Outward Bound," is an exception to the rule can be attributed to the care with which the finer elements of the original play were retained in the new version. You probably recall "Outward Bound" as the account of a strange ocean liner's voyage from one world to another and the startling realization by its oddly assorted passengers that all aboard have died. This knowledge was formerly withheld as a first-act curtain punch. Now it comes very early, following a fresh prologue that introduces the characters while they are alive and trying to embark from wartime England for America. A German bomb kills a large group of them and a double suicide attempt sends the lovers on their journey. The suspense is obtained from human anxieties and uncertainties regarding individual destinies when at last they meet The Examiner.

"Between Two Worlds" has a perfectly balanced cast of accomplished players. Paul Henreid and the appealing Eleanor Parker are the lovers. John Garfield does a grand job of the newspaperman. Sara Allgood is precious as Mrs. Midget. Sydney Greenstreet appears as The Examiner, and Edmund Gwenn as Scrubby, the "halfway" steward. George Coulouris is the selfish industrialist, Isobel Elsom the socialite, and Dennis King the minister. This fantasy is a treat for your spirit.

ONCE UPON A TIME

CERTAINLY no more fantastic notion has been filmed in years than "Once Upon a Time." Frequently chucklesome, when it could have been consistently hilarious, the basic idea triumphs over its shortcomings.

When the third straight flop of a big-time Broadway producer closes, he is reduced to his last nickel, washed up in show business. Then sudden good fortune smiles upon him. The big-shot meets a poor kid carrying a shoe box. Inside the box is a pet caterpillar trained to dance to the strains of "Yes, Sir, That's My Baby" played on a harmonica. In the boy, or rather in the caterpillar called "Curly," the desperate promoter sees an answer to all his problems. He will publicize the fuzzy dancing worm, ballyhoo it into an overnight sensation and capitalize upon Curly's popularity. The stunt captures the imagination of America. But when the time comes for the boy to part with his beloved pet, the youngster blandly announces that he wouldn't sell Curly for all the money in the world. It brings a split-up in the partnership, the man turns all-out heel, and coincidentally, Curly vanishes.

Cary Grant is unfortunately required to be too-much of a heel to allow his promoter to be numbered among his better performances. Young Ted Donaldson is grand as the kid. Janet Blair hasn't much to do as the boy's sister. Your friends will be talking about "Once Upon a Time," so you'll have to see it, too.

DAYS OF GLORY

HERE is the most sincere tribute yet paid by Hollywood to Russian indomitables who have fought a glorious fight in the defense of their homeland against the Nazi invaders. Unlike previous American pictures dealing with Russia, "Days of Glory" has a sense of reality that attains an almost documentary quality. This is achieved by casting the story with new screen personalities, from stars to extras. The result is a drama about a small band of men and women guerrilla warriors that you can believe. They live and breathe as they would not have done had established film familiars played these roles.

Gregory Peck as the comrade-commander makes one of the most interesting Hollywood debuts of the season. Dividing the love theme with him is Toumanova, formerly premier ballerina of the Ballet Russe. She suffers momentarily from the fact that her introduction in the story seems to be forced. Not until later in proceedings does her talent rise above the characterization.

The screen "veteran" of the troupe is Maria Palmer, who was formerly seen for all of three minutes as Litvinov's daughter in "Mission to Moscow." Lowell Gilmore as Semyon, keeper of the records, has an unfortunate similarity to the late Leslie Howard in appearance and delivery. Alan Reed, better known to radio listeners as the amusing Falstaff Openshaw of the Fred Allen program, creates a sterling impression as the quarrelsome drunkard, Sasha.

YOUR PROBLEM and MINE

BY Bonita Granville

Here's pretty and intelligent Bonita batting out answers to your letters on her typewriter.

Do you have personal problems that you feel only youth can solve? If you do, let Bonita Granville be your counsellor. Address Bonita Granville, in care of Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California, and try to keep letters down to two hundred words. Watch for her replies such as the ones we print in this issue. You can see that Bonita is serious and wise for her years, and because she considers herself just another of the "younger generation" she may be able to help you with your problems.

WAR WIFE

Dear Miss Granville:

I am one of the many war wives with a problem. I am nineteen years old and have an eight-months-old baby. My husband is overseas in the army.

I know my problem is an old one, but it is very important to me. Do you think it is bad for me to entertain soldiers in my mother's home? After all, I want fun, but I don't want people to misunderstand.

I am very much in love with my husband and respect the marriage code. I am not an immoral girl and am not looking for a man. I just want companionship and some fun. My husband is a clean, decent man, and I don't want to do anything to hurt him, especially while he is doing such fine work for our country.

My husband is very jealous and wouldn't want me to go out with men, but I can see no harm in having friends in and think we can entertain soldiers. After all, I want someone where my husband is to see that he has nice companionship too.

What do you think about my attitude, and what do you think I should do about it?

Sincerely,
Mary June C. (Mrs.)

Dear Mary June:

I think your attitude about wanting companionship is only natural. Your first and primary thought should be to explain it carefully to your husband. Tell him how you feel, that you want to entertain the boys at home with your mother. You should have his full permission before you do anything. It might be well also to have your mother write too.

Perhaps you could invite a few of your young friends in once a week and give a small informal party for some of the soldiers in your town. Surely the USO would welcome sending the boys in to a nice home atmosphere.

You didn't mention whether your husband's family live in your town. If they do, it might be nice to ask them also, so they can see and report to your husband. After all, many miles separate you both, and misunderstandings can arise that are not easy to patch up. However, your letter to me was so earnest and honest that I am sure, if you wrote the exact kind to your husband, he would give his permission.

If more war wives thought of this plan, they would be happier. I hope you get your husband's permission. If you don't, you should try going out more with your mother, visiting friends and having them in your home, but I do agree that you need the association of other than your own sex and think you have solved your problem.

Sincerely,
Bonita

BOY-CRAZY

Dear Bonita:

I wonder if you can help me? Could you tell me whether everyone goes through a boy-crazy stage? My brother, who is two years older than me, says I am crazy to write and ask you that, but I am sure you will answer me.

I am in love with so many boys, and it worries me. I wonder, when it is time for me to be married, how I will know if I am really in love. Another thing that worries me is, when I get married if I will see another man and fall in love with him. How do people know when they are really in love?

Perhaps you think I am too young to be thinking of this, for I am only fifteen, but this is a problem that bothers me and which I know some day I will have to face. Most of the other girls my age think of the same thing, so if you do answer this, you will also be helping a lot more girls than me.

Love to you,
Barbara

Dear Barbara:

Of course I can help you. Remember it was only a few years ago that I wondered just as you do.

Everyone goes through a boy-craze stage. It follows the time when you have a crush on your teacher. There is no harm in it, if you keep your head. The only thing I can tell you is, now is the time for you to think about the type of man you eventually will want to marry. Plan in your mind the kind of person he should be. Think of the qualities of fineness, tenderness, honesty, ability to get along with other people, and everything you most admire about your father and your family's friends. When you have your mental picture, think of it when you get a "crush" on some boy.

When you are thinking of the man you eventually want, take stock in yourself and think how you can build yourself to become the kind of woman the man of your choice will want. Think of your appearance, your education, your activities and how they will build yourself for your future life.

As far as your association with the boys right now, try to be a friend with them rather than be a sweetheart. The way of the world is that love ripens out of friendship, and love at first sight is seldom and rare. Be natural and friendly and interested in them, and you will find that love will come to you at the right time.

My best wishes to you.

Sincerely,
Bonita

TWO LOVES

Dear Bonita:

Is it possible to be in love with two people? I am a soldier in a camp in the South. I have a girl at home whom I have gone with for about a year. She writes to me regularly, about once a week and sometimes oftener. I truly love her and respect her. She is willing to wait until after the war to marry me.

While down here on maneuvers, I have met another girl and fallen in love with her too. She is very nice, and I know she will wait until after the war for me too.

Which girl shall I choose? I shall thank you from the bottom of my heart if you will help me with my problem.

Do you think a man should marry in war time? I soon will be sent overseas and should like to make up my mind before I go.

Sincerely,
Pfc. Henry

Dear Henry:

I don't think it is possible to be in love with two people at the same time.

The only way you will know which girl to choose is not to marry either of them until conditions for you have settled down, and that will be after the war.

Right now, you should have the companionship of nice girls, but you shouldn't be thinking of getting married. Your girl at home sounds like the girl for you. You know each other and grew up with one another; thus you have more in common. The girl in the town near your camp probably is infatuated with you. Why don't you let time iron it out? Don't promise either girl; just keep your friendship with them and decide after the war.

Sincerely,
Bonita

LOST CONFIDENCE

Dear Bonita Granville:

I am a soldier in the Army returned from active service of over a year and a half.

I have a definite problem which you as a young woman can help me. Your advice will definitely help me in the unusual decision I must make within the next few weeks.

While overseas, I was disabled and am being discharged from the Army. My disability is an arm injury, which makes me not fit for service. My girl doesn't know about this, and we had been planning to marry whenever I got a furlough and could come home. We had planned to marry, even if I had to go back to service the next day, for we have waited so long.

She doesn't know anything about this, and I wonder what she is going to think. I am not the same man who went away. How will she feel, what do you think she will do when she finds out, and what do you think I should do about our marriage plans? Should I go home and find out, or should I tell her first? I don't want pity, but I don't want to have her marry me out of pity.

Thanks a lot from,
Bob

Dear Bob:

You boys returning from overseas need all the understanding we who stay here can give you. We try very hard, and hope that we can make you comfortable and happy. You too have a duty toward us. Give us the chance and see how we react.

Trust your girl; give her that chance. Naturally, you are upset about what happened to you. It has changed your life pattern, but you have picked her to be your wife, and she must be given the opportunity to be a good one.

Write a letter first and tell her what has happened. Then go home and talk to her. Don't use the fact that you are disabled to give you an excuse to doubt her.

If I were your girl, I would expect you to tell me and to give me the opportunity of helping you work out your problem and mine.

I hope my advice has helped you. Thank you for writing me.

Bonita

OVERSEAS VET

Dear Bonita:

I have just returned from overseas and have a very great problem.

I am twenty-one years old, and the girl I am engaged to is eighteen. We have been going steady with one another for a year before I went into the service.

Before I came home, her letters became fewer and fewer, and I couldn't understand, for she used to write to me about three times a week.

When I came home, she welcomed me as if I had never been away. She was still in love with me. Finally I got her to admit the reason she hadn't been so prompt in her letters. It seems that, after I went away, she went out with a boy in the army stationed near our home. She swears nothing happened, but people in town talked. She finally didn't go out with him any more, but people kept on talking about her. She swears they were just friends, but somehow I doubt her, and I wonder if we should get married. I haven't told her how I feel about it, but I do think I should tell her I don't believe her. After all, marriage is based on mutual trust, don't you think?

Yours sincerely,
John A.

Dear John A:

Yours is not a pretty problem, and it makes me a bit cross with you. It is hard for a woman to make a mistake and admit it, and your fiancee has done it. Are you going to depend on idle gossip to settle your life path or the girl you are in love with?

Remember you, yourself, sometime in your life have done things that you regretted, but when you owned up to them, you found yourself a wiser person.

It seems to me that your girl has been honest with you, and also that your doubt is hurting your relations with her.

Why don't you sit down and talk to her? Tell her of your doubts and that now you know she was honest, and you regret your feelings that you felt you must tell her. Through this, you should have a new understanding, and your marriage will work out.

My every good wish for your happiness. Congratulations in getting such a fine and honest girl.

Sincerely,
Bonita

LOVE QUESTION

Dear Bonita:

Here is my problem, and it won't be an easy one for you to solve for me.

I am a young girl of eighteen and considered very pretty.

In high school I had had no special boy friend, but about ten months ago, I met a very nice looking and fine boy, whom I grew to like very much.

We have had very few dates together, for he works, and I have to help my mother at home after school, but we do see each other at the baseball games and sometimes the dances at school.

I don't know whether to see him any more, for he has grown very fond of me, and our religious faiths are not the same. He says he is in love with me, but I haven't told my mother, for I am afraid she will tell me not to see him any more.

You are a young girl like myself; I don't know your faith, but surely you must have some idea what I should do.

I know I am young, and this may just be an infatuation, but I don't think so, and to lose him would break my heart. My mother knows him and likes him, but doesn't know how seriously I like him.

Flora

Dear Flora:

First let me tell you that the reason we are fighting this war is that all people may be free and equal. We are fighting race and religious prejudice.

From your letter, I gather that you two have no intention of marrying right away, but you would like to plan on it. I think you should whenever you have the full permission of your parents and his.

You should talk to the boy and explain your feelings about your religion and listen to his explanation about his. You both are deeply religious, I can see, and I am sure you will be able to work this out each with deep respect for the other's faith.

Your parents, naturally, should be consulted; explain to them how you feel, about your love for this boy, and that you realize your religious feelings could upset your marriage, unless it is all understood before. I am sure they will understand, and if they don't, talk to the pastor of your church and have him talk to them.

I sincerely hope I have helped you with your problem. Let me know.

Cordially,
Bonita

ROBERT WALKER

gentleman who welcomed them to that tight little band of bindle stiffs operating in empty freight cars all over the land. He had, he said, a brother in Los Angeles replete with cars, summer and winter houses, and jobs for boys of ability.

He would, he added genially, be glad to line things up for the boys with this imposing brother. For a slight consideration. They were to secure, by any means, his food supply during the trip. The boys decided it was a fair brokerage fee. Whenever they reached a small town where the freight trains were reorganized, Bob and his buddy hurried through the districts near the tracks.

The method was simple. They knocked. A housewife answered. They said, "Please, ma'am, do you have an odd job I could do for you? I'm hungry and I'd like to earn something to eat."

The housewife, confronted by such youth, ambition and obvious appetite, said she was fresh out of jobs, but how about taking this sandwich, or this loaf of bread, or this hunk of cake? How about a glass of milk and some fresh fruit?

It is approximately 700 miles from Ogden to Las Vegas, Nevada, and—traveling as they were—this distance represented quite a few meals for three. As the freight neared Las Vegas, the boys' companion—he of the plutocratic brother—excused himself from their car on the pretext of getting a breath of fresh air on the roof. The boys noticed that a good many of their traveling companions were dropping off, but the train seemed to be moving very fast for amateurs to abandon. They remained huddled in their car.

What they didn't know was that the railroad cops at Las Vegas have a reputation for being rugged. The itinerant gentry, well aware of the dangers, left the innocents to fend for themselves. They were found by flashlight, big-eyed and timorous, from the car door when the cop made his rounds. He questioned them and they, with great presence of mind, explained that they had been preparing to run away from Las Vegas.

"You kids get away from the railroad yards and beat it back to your home," the officer ordered. "Get going before I turn you over to the juvenile authorities and they raise cain with your parents."

They got going. They found a grassy square in the center of town, and there they slept away the night. The next morning, after cinching in their belts beyond the breakfast line (they were afraid to beg), they trudged out on the highway to thumb their way to Los Angeles. Surely there, they would find their vanished friend and his munificent brother.

Nine o'clock scorched into ten, and ten blazed into noon. Noon scorched into two o'clock, and two blistered into four. No rides.

Giving up their thumb-trip to Los Angeles, two perspiration-soaked, dust-encrusted, grumbling-stomached boys trudged achingly back to Las Vegas and their haven of the public square.

Bob pulled off his shoe and lifted out a shining object; a silver dollar that he had been holding in reserve for just such an emergency. He and his side-kick repaired to the nearest counter and each ate fifty cents worth of cake and ice cream. They slept in the park that night and caught a freight, Ogden-bound, the next morning.

Bob's family, unfortunately, couldn't bring themselves to look upon his adventure with an objective eye. His mother had spent several days in tears, and his older brothers had promised, resultantly, to produce blisters on a certain part of the Walker flesh. Yet they were so glad to see him—all in one hungry hunk—that they forgave him on sight.

However, he had been at home only a few days when he overheard some conversation that buoyed him considerably. His aunt, Mrs. Hortense Odlum of New York, had suggested repeatedly that Bob be sent to a private school in which the teachers would study him and develop the innate ability that she believed he possessed. She had mentioned in frequent letters that she would be glad to pay his tuition, as she had that of several of Bob's cousins. So, having agreed that Bob was a problem child, his parents decided to send him to the San Diego Army and Navy Academy.

Bob, his sharp elbows akimbo, his thin legs busy with distance, hurried to his boy friend's home to impart the news: "Hey, kid, I'm being sent to a military school. Howja like that? I'm too tough to handle. They're sending me away." He was vastly impressed with his own potentialities as a desperate character.

This bravado lasted for a week—until he was thoroughly settled at school. Then he discovered that he was just a hick kid from the big outdoors. His smooth classmates, some from Eastern schools, some from private tutors (all rather sophisticated in an adolescent sort of way) looked him over and decided he was of no particular interest. He was too long for his trousers and his sleeves; he lacked the easy mingling knack of the initiates. His complexion was at its worst.

Then two things happened: he was given the responsible (and active) post of second drummer in the school band. And Mrs. Virginia Atkinson, the drama teacher, noticed him. There was something about his intensity over the tympani, something about the mobility of his freckled, sensitive face that convinced her of Bob's dramatic possibilities.

"Robert, how would you like to be in the next school play?"

He looked at her incredulously. "Me? Gosh, Mrs. Atkinson, I don't know anything about acting." But his eyes rested hungrily on her face. At last someone thought he could do something beside get into trouble.

"Would you like to have me coach you? I think you're just right for the lead in our next play. It's a dramatic thing about a man in prison who learns that his baby is dying. He prays that the child will live until morning, and promises that if his prayer is answered he will go straight."

Bob looked at Mrs. Atkinson. "You think I could do that? Honest?"

"Why not?" she wanted to know, her lips curving into a smile. At that moment, Bob would have lain on a railway track to be bisected by a locomotive if Mrs. Atkinson had suggested it. She believed in him! She was giving him a chance to be noticed—the thing that, subconsciously, he had always wanted. At last he had a chance to lick the little-brother complex—and he was determined to do it.

He learned how to handle his long, slender body. He learned the telling stage tricks of the eyes. He learned voice placement, timing, and emphasis. "Is that right, Mrs. Atkinson? Am I putting it across?"

"Over the plate," said Mrs. Atkinson who knew a lot about boys.

The play was so deftly done that it won first place in the district competition. Then it was presented at Pasadena Community Playhouse to compete in the finals. The production won first place and the leading man, one Mr. Robert Walker, was awarded first prize for his characterization. This award also carried a year's scholarship to the Pasadena Community Playhouse.

Bob, meeting Mrs. Atkinson jubilantly in the wings, shook hands, violently. "Gosh, you're some coach!"

"You're some student. This is only the beginning," she prophesied, thus earning some sort of stature as a psychic.

The following year the play she coached repeated the first triumph by winning top honors and Bob, again the star of the play, resnatched his No. 1 spot and a repeat offer of a scholarship. But the news of his two-time winnings had delighted Mrs. Odlum in New York. Now she had ideas of her own.

"I'd like to watch him work," she wrote. "Send him to New York and I'll see him through the Academy of Dramatic Arts." This was another step—a big step for Robert Walker.

Whereupon the erstwhile scapegoat of Ogden, Utah, boarded a train for big time. His first day at the Academy was memorable for a number of things.

Having triumphed over his environment in San Diego, he expected to be at ease in New York, but the city seemed suddenly mammoth and threatening despite its glitter—much like an iceberg on a bright March morning.

When he was selected to read lines, he missed the partisan nod of Mrs. Atkinson from the audience. Yet, out there in the daisy field of round and eager faces, Bob abruptly noticed one face distinctive from the rest. A girl's face—delicate of bone structure and sweet of mien.

Bob had selected a scene from "Just Till Morning" and played it as he had never done before. He was aware of every sentence, of every gesture. The power was in his hands and the fire in his spirit.

Afterward, The Girl approached him with quiet assurance. "I liked the way you read very much," she said. "My name is Phyllis Isley and I'm from Tulsa, Oklahoma." Robert Walker smiled broadly.

Bob didn't know it, but he had just met the future Jennifer Jones, and simultaneously the future Mrs. Robert Walker.

IMPULSIVE REBEL

argued louder and better than ever.

Once an interviewer tried to give her some advice. "Listen," he said, "I'm old enough to be your father."

"I'll say," she said.

When producers tried to tell her how to sing, she told them they didn't know what they were talking about. Usually they didn't—which made it worse. Paramount couldn't understand that Susanna would take singing instructions from a $100 a week singing coach who knew his stuff, but wouldn't pay any attention to a $10,000 a week executive who didn't know Beethoven from boogie woogie.

Worse than all this was the mind-speaking.

"The studio kept telling me," confesses Susanna, " 'Don't go around airing your opinions.' What was I supposed to do when people asked me what I thought? Say, 'I don't know?' "

She grins now, remembering it, this girl who at last and at Universal is on the road to major stardom. She says, "I have learned not to be cruel. I won't be a hypocrite, but I'll fib to save somebody from being hurt. I've grown to like more people, to be more tolerant."

She likes everybody on the Universal lot. She is very emphatic on the subject of Donald O'Connor. "I like him terrifically," she says. "He has many talents lying dormant. Some day they will show in a picture, and you'll see him winning an Academy Award."

Yes, Susanna has grown up. She still doesn't conform to the Hollywood idea of a star—she doesn't walk like a star (her steps are too jerky); she doesn't talk like a star (when she gets excited, she still shouts); and she doesn't act like a star. She still bursts into song, any time, any place, whenever she feels like it.

Some well-meaning people have said to her, "For heaven's sake, Susanna, save your voice. If you keep on like this, singing whenever you feel like it, you'll have no voice at all left in ten years."

"Maybe they're right," says Susanna, "but if I have no voice left in ten years, I'll do something else. When you feel like singing, you should sing. You should sing because it's part of you, because you're happy or unhappy. You sing to express your feelings. If I stopped singing, I would be miserable."

When Susanna made a personal appearance tour in Minneapolis, for the premiere of "Phantom of the Opera," her studio begged her to spare her voice. But when Susanna appeared on the stage, her fans yelled for her to sing.

"All right," said Susanna finally. "I will sing." And she did, not one, but half a dozen songs, on every stage where she appeared.

On the train going home to Hollywood, Susanna sang for hours in her drawing room. She thought that only Gilda Marchetti, her friend and singing teacher, and Betty Mitchell, the studio representative, were listening; but when she opened the door, she found nearly the whole staff of the train standing outside the drawing room listening. Collected there were waiters, conductors, cooks and passengers. So she just lowered her voice a little and went on, as gaily as before.

Susanna has been singing all her life. She began singing almost as soon as she began breathing. That was in Chicago. Susanna's real name was Suzanne DeLee Flanders Larson. The DeLee was in honor of Dr. DeLee, who brought Susanna into the world. The Larsons were broke at the time; Dr. DeLee didn't send a bill, and they showed their appreciation by giving Susanna his name as a middle name.

Also from the day she was born, Susanna was a rebel. She gets vehement today on the subject of bringing up children. "Never say 'don't' to a child," says Susanna, "unless you can give the child a very good reason. People have been saying 'don't' to me from the day I was born. But the word 'don't' has never stopped me from doing anything, unless people gave good reasons."

Rebel or no rebel, Susanna sang like an angel. Her mother was sure she could go places. When Mary McCormic, the opera singer, came to visit Minneapolis, where the family had moved, Mrs. Larson saw to it that her talented daughter was brought to the great star's attention.

"I was an ugly kid then," Susanna says, "but Mary McCormic was very kind. She said I had promise as a singer."

Encouraged by those words, Mrs. Larson took Susanna to Carl Johnson, the orchestra conductor. He got her a chance to sing on the stage of a Minneapolis theater. He also introduced her to Merle Potter, a drama critic, who liked Susanna's voice so well that he sent a recording of it to several studios, and M-G-M signed her at once. The family moved into a nice home in Beverly Hills; Susanna went to the studio school; and thought she'd hit the jackpot.

But on the same lot were Deanna Durbin and Judy Garland, and the studio needed only one outstanding child singer. One day someone looked over the contract list, spotted Susanna's name, asked, "What has she been in?" was told "Nothing," and decided that the studio might as well let her go.

Susanna's family had to move out of its nice home in Beverly Hills and into a little flat at Venice, five miles away in fact and a thousand in prestige. The furniture men came to claim the household furnishing, because all the installments hadn't been paid.

But Susanna didn't weep. She had cried at M-G-M when she was not put to work, but now she was just mad. She made up her mind that she would persuade someone to give her the opportunity she wanted.

Finally she got it at Paramount. The studio needed a girl singer for "The Great Victor Herbert." They auditioned Susanna, and got out their contracts in a hurry. She was a great find, destined to be, they thought, the Deanna Durbin of the Paramount lot.

"The Great Victor Herbert" was released with much thumping of drums, but it did only so-so at the box-office.

They cast Susanna in "There's Magic in Music." There was no magic in the picture and it was a turkey with the public.

Now Susanna, as you have already seen, had been misbehavin' in many ways, such as taking verbal socks at Paramount's pet players. For all this, she might have been forgiven if she had had Lana Turner's pull at the box-office. But "There's Magic in Music" did so badly that to quote Susanna, "I just didn't exist at Paramount after that picure."

When option time came around, Susanna found the fatal blue slip in her pay envelope.

Today, Susanna has no kick about Paramount. "Paramount paid me for growing up," she says. "I was there three and a half years and made three pictures. Certainly the work I did wasn't worth the pay I got."

But when in November, 1942, the studio let her go, the late Myron Selznick, who was Hollywood's top agent, pounced on her. In signing her he said, "If I can't get you something within six weeks, I'll quit myself."

After his return from the overseas tour Ray Milland went Mocambo-ing with Mrs. Milland. The strain of the trip definitely shows on Ray. See story "Romances of Ray Milland" on page 30.

Just to play safe, however, Susanna made out an application for a job at Lockheed. But Myron Selznick lived up to his promises. Within forty days he got Susanna a job. Universal needed a singing star to play opposite Nelson Eddy in "Phantom of the Opera."

Technicolor brought out the haunting, delicate loveliness of Susanna's features. She clicked. Universal put her into a couple of triangle pictures with Peggy Ryan and Donald O'Connor. She clicked again. Universal bought a story called "Angela" and changed the title to "This Is the Life" and put Susanna in it. It looks like another sure-fire hit.

At the present time Susanna is acting in "The Climax," a drama which takes place around 1890. She plays an opera singer; and has Turhan Bey and Boris Karloff for her leading men. When I saw her, she was wearing her costume in the picture, a floor-reaching affair of apricot wool with a shoulder cape. There was cream-colored Cluny lace at the neckline—and mink trimming on both the dress and the cape. Susanna looked like a vignette from the year 1890. But she didn't talk like one. "I've always been a mental tomboy," she said. "I can't swim or climb, but mentally I'm a tomboy.

"To accomplish anything, you must retain your individuality. You must be yourself. You must use your own judgment. No two people are alike, and the rules that will work for one won't work for another. Don't follow in someone else's footsteps. The rules that are fine for Mamie Jones won't work for Mary Smith."

Susanna admits she's impulsive. "If you do things based on something that comes out of your feelings, out of your hunches, you can't go very far wrong. I do impulsive things at surprising moments."

There was the time when she was appearing in a radio show and a heckler in the audience began to yell that the commercial she was reading about soap was a fake. Instead of ignoring him, she interrupted the commercial, turned to the heckler and shouted, "I do too use that soap and it is good."

Another time, she was giving out with a song on a radio broadcast and she had to sing some very difficult notes. When she finished, Susanna mopped her forehead and said, "Whew!"

When she made her personal appearance tour for the opening of "Phantom of the Opera," she and her studio representative stopped off at Chicago. They got there late (you know how late trains run these days), bathed, rested and then gave out with the interview. When they got through, it was six. At eleven they were to catch a train for Minneapolis, where the Mayor was waiting for them.

"We have five hours," said Susanna. "I have a grandmother in Aurora, just outside Chicago. I'm going to visit her. She's old and paralyzed and couldn't possibly visit me."

The studio representative began to worry. "I'll be back at ten," Susanna said, "in plenty of time to catch the train."

And off she went. She not only visited her grandmother, but all her other relatives in Aurora. But Susanna was back at ten, as she had promised.

Susanna believes in doing many things on impulse, but says she will not marry on impulse. "I'll think and think until I am sure. Maybe I'll be sure the minute I meet him.

"I am not in love now. I have never been in love.

"I go out on dates only once in a while. I won't go out with anyone I don't like. Turhan Bey? I have gone out with him. He's one of the nicest people in Hollywood. And a swell actor! We're great friends.

"I like records and music. 'La Boheme' is my favorite opera; 'Thanks for the Memory' my favorite song." She also likes spaghetti with cheese, watermelon, "Mairzy Doats" and Richard Tauber, the Viennese tenor. "And I'm a sucker for Viennese waltzes. I also like Lin Yutang's books, Cyrano de Bergerac, and the sayings of Confucius—the real ones, not those silly 'Confucius say' gags of a couple of years ago."

Susanna is definitely not attempting to play the Big Star. But unless all signs fail, she is going to be one.

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

. . . created especially for this purpose—QUEST* POWDER—soft, soothing, safe. It's the Kotex* Deodorant, approved by the Kotex laboratories. Being unscented, it doesn't merely cover up one odor with another. Quest Powder destroys napkin odor completely. It's your sure way to avoid offending.

STUBBORN AND CHARMING

While he waited that call to active duty, which came only recently, he fought things out in his own dogged way. By day he made pictures, and by night he taught flying classes, aeronautics, navigation and so on, to Civilian Air Patrol members. In his own home, at his own expense, he served by helping other men to be ready to take over the controls for defense.

Meantime, it was not by coincidence that his last two pictures happened to be two of the best performances of many exhilarating screen jobs he has turned out. He planned them that way.

"Too many people told me I couldn't keep up the pace—and that brought the mule out in me. I was so tired most of the time we were making 'O'Rourke' I was afraid to look at the camera. Up late every night, on the set early every morning, teaching all day on Sundays—you've seen the kind of faces that look like they've worn out nine bodies, haven't you? Well, that was the way mine was beginning to feel. What really kept me going was laughs—Jack Carson, Janie Wyman and Olivia were good for a howl a minute on the set. Those kids were a shot in the arm to me."

Since it was to be his last picture for the duration, Bob was glad it was a comedy. "Leave 'em laughing, Cummings, I kept telling myself—and you can always come back again!"

The screen colony has always had its quota of private pilots, fellows with enough money to own their own planes, and enough time to ride a hobby in the clouds. Cummings, on the other hand, has never been a playboy as far as flying is concerned. He has held a civilian instructor's rating for fifteen years—the first such rating ever to be issued in this country.

His current rating of Army Flight Instructor outranks that of any other military man he happens to be teaching. This is a necessity, he explains, when his pupil might possibly be a Colonel or a General.

An instructor, this one avers, has the dog's job of the Army. That's why he likes it. Mostly the trainees are youngsters.

"You get awfully fond of those kids," he says. "You realize you have to make men out of them, as well as pilots. The job is mental as well as mechanical—you almost have to be a psychologist. I think the reason so many actors make good flyers is that they are both highly individualistic endeavors. No one can act for you, or fly for you, but yourself."

Bob is thirty-five today, looks younger, thinks older. From the very beginning, Destiny marked him for a two-career man. He learned to fly in high school, kept it up while studying engineering at Carnegie Institute of Technology, earned a Captain's commission in the Carnegie R.O.T.C. Acting was sort of an accident that happened to him along about 1929, when he was on his way to be a commercial pilot.

"I'd been offered a job freighting equipment over the jungles," he explains. "I needed it. My dad was the kind of a doctor who, in a depression, didn't bother to collect his bills. He'd worked so hard his own heart had given out, and with his hospital expenses the family finances were in a precarious state. I felt big and brave, and ready to take over."

Spending a few days in New York before leaving for South America, he ran into a friend who had been newly bitten by the "acting bug." One fateful afternoon the boys got into an argument. Bob wanted to take a ride atop a "rubberneck" bus, his friend wanted to make a visit to the American Academy of Dramatic Arts (whence came many of our foremost screen thespians). They compromised. They'd both stop off at the Academy, then they'd both take the bus ride.

"I was sitting in the Academy's reception room, stubbornly holding the dime for the bus fare in my sweaty hand," he says, "when a professor came out and with no preamble, said I was a nice normal-looking boy, and that was what the stage needed. I tried to tell him that, believe it or not, I was just waiting for a bus ride. He offered me a scholarship and I wasn't interested—not until he gave up trying to persuade me and dropped a remark that maybe I didn't have the talent anyway.

"That did it. I got up out of the chair and went into a classroom and read for him. Probably no lines have ever been read worse, before or since. He liked the quality of my voice, however—and that's how a flyer, on his way to South America suddenly grounded himself for an acting career!"

As this goes to press, Bob has been married twice, divorced twice. He met his first wife at a kid costume party, married his second while they were both in musical comedy. Rumor has since connected his name with Fay McKenzie, but Bob is still an unpredictable guy, and has recently surprised Hollywood by the announcement of his engagement to Mary Constant, a non-professional.

You see, you never can tell about Cummings—as we were telling you in the very beginning.

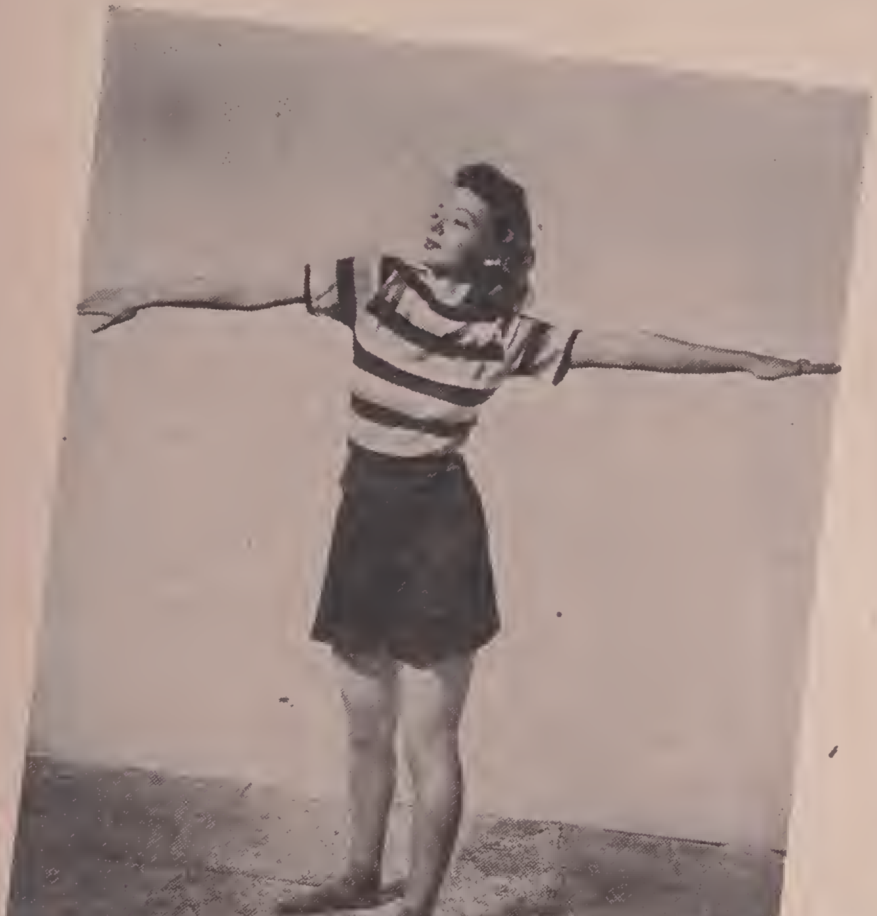
Easy DOES IT...

What point a pretty figure without poise? asks the lovely Evelyn Keyes, one of Columbia's popular stars. Easy grace and perfect posture begin with smooth, relaxed muscles. And, as Evelyn says, tenseness is apt to start in the shoulders where nerve centers become taut and tired. So loosen up —and take it easy. Try a few simple exercises like these, for instance.

Their purpose is twofold. The sharp-snap motion throws tight muscles into "release." The wind-up, a smoother, rolling movement, develops rhythm—which, in itself, is soothing and makes for a more graceful carriage.

Try them yourself! And you'll see why these setting-up stints are part of Miss Keyes own pet prescription for the jitters.



Stand erect, feet apart, arms out at sides. With alternate jerks, lift one shoulder forward and high, the other back and high, fifty times.

Clench fists and jerk shoulders up front, down front, down back, up back. Now repeat without jerking.

LONG KNOWN TO DOCTORS

NOW DISCOVERED BY WOMEN

A NEW outlook on the whole problem of monthly hygiene is provided by the invention of Tampax, the patented internal absorbent. This principle of internal absorption has long been used by doctors, but the physician who perfected Tampax has ingeniously made it available for women in general.

Tampax is so comfortable you forget you are wearing it. As it involves no belts, pins or external pads, there is of course no bulk to show, even with sheer formal evening gown or modern swim suit. Another advantage: no odor can form. Tampax is made of pure, genuine surgical cotton and a month's supply will go into an ordinary purse. Each individual Tampax is wrapped in patented applicator. Easy to insert, quick to change—and no disposal problems.

MOST ARDENT FAN

When Charles Boyer recently went to New York, he was met by his most ardent fan. Well, the fan is almost his own. The fan is the fan of Mr. Boyer's agent representative, Bill Smith.

Mr. Smith and Mr. Boyer have been associated in business for a long time, and Smith always accompanies him on all trips. He is quite a handsome young man and this young lady spotted him in New York and always comes down to meet the train when Boyer comes in. The first question she asks the great lover is, "Is he with you?" Then when Smith alights from the train she is happy and follows him around New York the whole time he is there.

Boyer gets quite a toot out of it.

COFFEE PROBLEM

Most frustrated wife in town is Mrs. Lloyd Nolan. Frustrated about coffee, and it isn't even rationed.

It seems that Mr. Nolan is particular about only one thing, hot coffee. His breakfast coffee can set the house in such an uproar if it isn't just right, and Mel Nolan, being the wife she is, tries very hard to please her lord and master.

Experimentation has been going on with Lloyd's coffee. First a mammoth cup was bought, placed on the table, the cook stood poised in the door with the coffee pot when she heard his footsteps come down the hall. When he sat down, she poured. Lloyd gulped and smiled.

Then as he read his paper the coffee cooled and nothing was right again. Next a heavy earthenware cup, to hold the heat, was purchased, but this didn't work. Then a thermos was purchased and heated, filled with coffee and placed on the table. This was poured in small quantities into a regular coffee cup of fine china. Still it wasn't right.

The final outcome, at this reading, is Mr. Nolan with the precious coffee kept hot in the kitchen, walking out there himself with a small demi-tasse, pouring it himself and gulping it down.

FAMOUS COMBINATIONS

Olivia de Havilland spends her spare time with Dwight Whitney, representative for a national magazine. . . . Veronica Lake with Paul Hesse, handsome color photographer. Ronnie could become the next Mrs. Paul Hesse, for he loves 'em beautiful and temperamental. Paul's last marriage with Elyse Knox, shortly to become the wife of Tommy Harmon, was just one of those things. . . . Ava Gardner with Howard Hughes. This has gone on for months and Ava is determined to become the next Mrs. Hughes. Bets are on that it won't happen, for Hughes is quite elusive. But Ava has a way with her, so this will bear watching.

HELPING HAND

Linda Darnell works at least four hours a day at St. Johns Hospital in Santa Monica. She isn't a nurse's aide. She just does lots of dirty work. She washes instruments after operations, cleans up the operating room and similar unpleasant tasks that take time but not much skill.

It all started when Linda discovered they are very short of nurses and nurse's aides at Santa Monica, and she volunteered to help. Little Nancy Gates visited Maureen O'Hara when Linda and her husband Pev Marley came to dinner one Sunday, and thus Linda got a new recruit. Nancy, just eighteen, now works regularly at these same unpleasant tasks.

Sonny Tufts' brown is surrounded by autograph seekers in every age group. Here's what happens when this popular idol leaves his studio.

SUNDAY WITH A MOVIE STAR

SUNDAY WITH A MOVIE STAR: Take a trip with us to Northridge to spend Sunday on her ranch with Lucille Ball and her guests. You are greeted by Lucille's mother, holding a baby and explaining that Lucille will be back soon. The baby is only one of two who live at the ranch, one being Lucille's brother's child and the other the child of a friend of hers.

Stay around a while and Van Johnson will come around the corner in swimming trunks and holding the other baby. Charles Ruggles will drop in with a quart of buttermilk for Lucille's mother, and Martha Scott and her husband, Carleton Alsop, stop by with their little son. Lucille's husband, Desi Arnaz, will come in about noon from working in the lower field, as he is home on leave from the Army.

Still no Lucille. You will have lunch, swim in the pool, help brush the dogs and tend the babies. About sundown a rackety station wagon will come to a stop in the yard and out will pile Lucille, home from a camp appearance and ready for a swim, chatter and a game of poker after dinner. Dinner is served on the enclosed porch with everyone helping—and the poker is for fun, not money. This is an average Sunday at the Ball-Arnaz ranch, and it's all swell!

HE-MAN STUFF

When Bill Holden came home on leave and found his infant son, Westy Holden, wearing dresses he hit the ceiling. Poor Brenda tried to explain that all young babies wore dresses, but Bill didn't like. Taking a tape measure he measured Westy from stem to stern, drove to Hollywood, walked into the baby department of a big store and began ordering knitted rompers fourteen inches long. When asked by the saleslady what size, he simply said that these were the measurements. Finally he emerged from the baby shop triumphant, armed with "boy's" clothes.

Westy wore them while his daddy was home, but as soon as Bill left, Brenda put him back in his dresses.

At twelve, he turned fickle and transferred his affections to a little girl sitting across from him. He doesn't attempt to excuse his action by anything other than the fact that her name was also Davis; Violet this time. Violet was almost as shy as he, but she taught him the value of little things—a smile, or a look from under her long lashes, could give an ordinary school-day the same glow as those printed in red on the calendars.

He was thirteen when he stole his first kiss—from a young lady who shall be nameless.

Public school was finished, then Ray went to King's College—and all of a sudden he was six-foot one-and-a-half, and in his dancing days.

The next woman in his life, although she probably never suspected it, was the aforementioned Queen Mary of England. It is doubtful if the dignified dowager ever gave any special notice to the tall dark young man who stood so stiffly at attention, or sat his horse so handsomely in the King's Guards.

He, on the other hand, credits Her Majesty for sharpening his appreciation of people as human beings. He remembers standing Stair Guard for the opening of Parliament and watching the Queen sweep regally past him up the stairs. With the heraldic trumpets blaring and the dignitaries bowing, Mary was calmly running one finger along the balustrade as she went, looking for dust. You've seen a dozen conscientious housewives go through the same motion.

He remembers once, too, when King George, ordinarily a mild-mannered man, stumbled on the staircase and emitted a cuss word. He got the same treatment any other husband would get under the circumstances—an indignant "George!" from the Queen. The King gave his wife a sheepish grin, and subsided.

Eventually the honorary position of guarding the royal household began to pall, mostly for financial reasons. Salary was $35 a week. To earn it, a young man had to equip himself with two uniforms at $3,000 apiece, and a special-occasion outfit costing a cool $5,000. In addition, he must own and fodder two very fine dark horses. What finally moved Ray to resign was that he was tired of wearing tight pants with no pockets. The pockets were especially desirable at the time, because an aunt had just left him $17,000.

He embarked on a grand tour of Europe, returning to London after a year.

"When I got back," Ray says, "the pockets weren't so necessary any more. I blew my last $50 all at once, taking Estelle Brody to dinner at Ciro's."

Miss Brody, then an English screen star, introduced Ray to the casting director who gave him his first movie job. Just recently, Ray was Mocamboing here in Hollywood with a party of friends, when the waiter told him a lady at another table had sent him a message. "She told me to ask you if you could get her a job," said the waiter. The lady was Miss Brody, now happily married and off screen. The incident was one of those neat little twists Fate is always fashioning.

Dark-haired Lya de Putti, Continental charmer who appeared briefly in American films, was next to be important in the Milland saga. Lya was starring in an English-made thriller in which she had to have a mirror shot out of her hand. Ray, who had learned expert marksmanship in the army, got the job.

"Miss Putti's hand was very valuable at the time," Ray says, "and the studio was grateful when I left the fingers on it. When the leading man in another film got sick, they gave me the role."

That really started him acting and he was an established screen and stage success in Britain when a Hollywood talent scout spotted him. Then began the inexplicable part of his career, with three separate grand entrances to Hollywood, each of them building up to nothing but a letdown.

Ray was living in a furnished room and a kind-hearted Hollywood druggist for several weeks served him his meals on the cuff. In desperation he applied for and got a job in a service station. Happened then one of those things that makes Hollywood a fairy tale town. Taking a bus to his gas station job, Ray got off in front of Paramount simply because it was where his bus came to a stop. He was passing the studio when a casting director stepped out and invited him inside. He had an acting job for him!

"The part would take about three weeks to shoot, and I didn't expect anything would come of it," Ray remembers. "I didn't want to be hungry again, so before I got into my make-up I rushed down and asked the gas station man if he could keep the other job open for me for three weeks. I told him my dear father in Iowa was seriously ill and I had to go home to see him. It was an impressive story, especially when I had never set foot in Iowa in my life."

The picture was "Bolero" with George Raft and the late Carole Lombard. When it was over, Ray went into "We're Not Dressing," and after that, Paramount gave him a contract —which he has been renewing, with an upped ante, ever since.

The day Ray drew his first Paramount paycheck, he went straight to a costumer and rented a formal outfit; tails, white tie and topper. The next day was Thanksgiving and Milland wasn't kidding. He went to a show, had his Thanksgiving meal, the biggest one he could eat, at the swankiest restaurant in town. Then he went to the drug store that had been feeding him. He planned to buy a bottle of fine wine, drink it with the druggist, and pay his long overdue bill. When he got there, he found the fellow had been keeping a free turkey dinner warm for him all day!

"It had given him so much pleasure to do this for a chap he thought needed it, I couldn't spoil his fun. I was stuffed fuller than any bird he had served that day, but I ate the whole meal, acting like I had never enjoyed anything so much in my life, while he stood there beaming. I didn't pay until two days later. He doesn't know that I could have paid it that Thanksgiving!"

Enter, shortly thereafter, two women most directly responsible for his happiness and success becoming permanent, his wife and Claudette Colbert.

"Claudette is such swell people," is the way Ray puts it. "I had one chance with her, in 'Gilded Lily,' and fluffed it. I was nervous and trying too hard to please. Working with her was such a pleasure, however, I always felt I had benefited by the experience—even if the picture didn't!"

Later, when Claudette was to make "Arise, My Love," with the privilege of choosing her own leading man, Milland was it, she said, or she wouldn't play. They proved such a happy combination that when she made the same demand for "Skylark," the producers joyously agreed.

But no woman, past or future, has ever meant to Ray what Muriel Weber Milland means to him. When I first met Ray in Chicago, some seven years ago, he told me happily, "I am married to the most beautiful woman in the world!" Lunching at Lucey's in Hollywood, just a few weeks ago, he told me just as happily, "I am married to the most beautiful woman in the world!" This can practically be classified as perpetual emotion in Hollywood. Besides, it's true that Muriel, who is "Mal" to her husband and friends, is one of Hollywood's great beauties.

They met at a bridge party in New York. Muriel was brought to his table by actress Martha Sleeper, and introduced. Ray was an instant hit, because, as his wife explains it, he was the only one of the four men who stood up.

"It's the only reason I won a second look," he insists, "but it took me six months to convince her I was really an upstanding young man."

The lovely Muriel had a disturbing habit of taking his frequent proposals as just part of the fun they were having. Then one week, another young lady of Ray's acquaintance telephoned and asked him if he would take her to the circus. He would. The next day Muriel's sister called him. Seems that he had asked Muriel to the same circus, a few days before.

"I forgot," said Ray, "and Muriel won't care anyhow."

"That's what you think," said sister. "She's been crying all day!"

So they've lived happily ever afterward, with one small Daniel David Milland now making it a threesome.

So next time you hear this heckling hero making with the pointed persiflage on the screen, just remember he's reading lines he personally doesn't subscribe to. The inside dope is, he thinks women are wonderful.

We have just one statement to add. It's "Vice versa!"

THE END

IF I WERE A POLITICIAN

than a man. For one thing she would better be able to avert war. Women," and she added this with a smile, "like to talk a little more than men do. I am afraid I'm one of those people who believe that talking can still go a long way towards peace.

"Perhaps I sound like a glad girl, a Pollyanna. But I like to feel that women will play an important part in the furtherance of a lasting peace without which no country in the world, nor its people, can live, breathe freely, or even survive. Women, after this war, having lost their sons, their fathers, their brothers, all their loved ones, won't stay in the background when it comes to deciding future campaigns. There won't be cause to say, 'We've broken faith with the dead,' as Susan did in 'White Cliffs of Dover'.

"Oh, I know that the die-hards feel that the women cannot adjust themselves to meeting and discussing things with the men on their own ground," she told me. "It even happens at the studio, where men writers constantly refuse to work with women writers because they imagine they haven't the freedom of speech, gesture or opinion that they have among themselves. While the women insist on being treated as equals, they are, and will always be, women. This is doubly so in politics. It is true that while some of them will let fly into their opposition in Washington with fury, two-fisted arguments and strong words, their masculine opponents won't hit back, out of respect, pity, for my sex.

"Speaking for myself, I would much rather do business with men. I have been flattered to think that time and time again I have been men's equal in business matters. I am quite sure that a woman can be equally successful in politics. But she will have to be intellectual, well educated and quite experienced before she will come up all right. Women, for instance, are superior to men in debates. Once they know what they want they will be able to go after it in their own way, and get it.

"Still, I know our entry into big politics will be an uphill grind all the way. Any well-known woman running for Congress—well-known, that is, in a field foreign to politics—will have all she can do to make her political associates as well as the public feel that she is real, sincere and helpful. I believe that this can be partly done when her own life stands up as an example of her sincerity. Sooner or later in politics the weaknesses of one's private life will be found out. If they exist to start with, the battle is already lost. And I also know that if the woman who tries to leave the stage or screen for politics doesn't go into it wholeheartedly, or feels she can mix both, she will be a sadly disillusioned female. Career and marriage may mix, but the show-world and the greater show-world of Washington don't."

Miss Dunne and her husband, Dr. Griffin, while in key politically, evade political discussions socially.

"Politics with us," confided Miss Dunne, "are a serious, everyday matter. But they don't present such problems to us that all our emotions are frayed merely contemplating them. So one night when a friend at dinner wanted to start such a discussion we played bridge instead. Altogether, we don't believe in going in for much discussing of politics, because we prefer to wait a little and know what we're talking about.

"Take the Wacs, Waves and Marines," said Miss Dunne. "Their whole heart and soul is in the holding down of their jobs. Theirs is a continual struggle against the thinly-disguised feelings of the men in uniform who won't recognize their value, or even associate with them—purely because they're women. These are the same girls they would go all out of their way to make friends with if they were in an evening gown or a sun suit. But in uniform, it's a different matter. I have met hundreds of them, and they all have the same story to tell. They were all lovely girls, every one of them. I was impressed by their youth, their attractiveness and the poise with which they have battled the critics and the continual resentment of the men in uniform.

"Yet I think these girls will be able to adjust themselves much better and much quicker, after the war, than the men will. The men will come back as supermen, and heaven help the women who will say them nay.

"Women's great problem will come after the war, but its solution will be somewhat simplified by her domestic state. If she has married during the war her problem will be less acute. Miss Dunne thinks she will be glad to go back to simple, domestic duties. On the other hand if she occupies a position of importance, commands a large salary and has a taste for power—luxuries she has never before known, and an emasculated freedom—her problem and the solving of it will be hard and harsh.

"It will be difficult to imagine that the average American woman, having taken up masculine work and carried out masculine duties, will be able to revert naturally to her more feminine accomplishments. Recently," went on Miss Dunne, "I talked with one of the heads of the big war plants, and he couldn't disguise the seriousness with which he contemplated the postwar period as far as women are concerned. He envisaged a period of readjustment the like of which civilization has never known."

As for the men returning from overseas after the war, Miss Dunne had this to say: "These men are not coming back in any shilly-shally manner. They may not be exactly hard-boiled, but they'll be tough. They won't stand for much nonsense. They'll have a new outlook on life that women may find a little hard to get accustomed to. Whatever resentment they may have, in seeing women play their parts realistically and efficiently, may vanish when they realize that they were doing this only until the men come back. After all, women have kept things running rather well."

It was in this same vein that Miss Dunne told me that if she were to enter politics her main goal would be to exact a maximum of good with a minimum of strife. "That should be the aim of any real and sincere politician. You can't make the whole world over, but if you work hard and think in the right direction, you can do an awful lot of good in your own local territory.

Offering the thought that the most important place in politics a woman rises to is not necessarily by title, but by achievement. Irene Dunne explained, "If I were to go into politics seriously, I know I would want to do everything I could for my community. My interests would be local, rather than national. I would have prominence for my town, rather than prominence for myself. There are other more competent authorities to take care of world development and world improvement. Although I wouldn't want to be blind to what is happening in the rest of my country, because that would affect my own interests, and the interests of the people in my own community.

"Employment for everyone will be the first and gravest problem we will have to meet; housing, the next one. How grave this is can best be explained when I tell you that I was talking to one of the biggest builders in America the other day. He said, 'I don't expect to be able to build for ten years after the war is over.' The government will have to take a hand —and what a hand, in this matter alone.

"Child welfare is one of the important matters that a woman in politics will have to face and solve, although I think that this is one problem that will rather take care of itself. For instance, the women will be able to go back to their families, stop paying other women to look after their children, and devote all their time to their proper upbringing. There won't be the chaos there is today. I have great hopes myself for the after-the-war period to put an end to a great deal of the bugaboos of today."

In the matter of postwar education, Irene Dunne would like to see an educational system censoring certain parts of radio programs, motion-picture entertainment, stage shows that have knowingly had an adverse effect on minors. Particularly true is this in the case of horror stories. "I for one know that I never let my eight-year-old daughter listen to crime stories and the like," she confessed. "And it is particularly difficult because I know that she, like all children of her age, is so partial to them. While I am disturbed to what ends a censorship may go, I do think this is one instance where it is really necessary."

By this time the sun had gone down, casting long shadows in the panelled and flowered library, my sherry glass was empty, and guests were expected for dinner. I looked at the clock, quickly crossed my fingers and said, "If ever you should enter politics and have a say in our domestic grievances, what are some of the things you would like to see done?"

Again that twinkle, as Irene Dunne bent forward to turn on a light. "I believe I would attempt to simplify the tax problem. I would try to work out a simplification of the form itself, and would have the tax distributed in such a way that everyone is taxed something, with the wealthy carrying their full quota. But particularly I would try to have a system worked whereby the form itself would be far simpler than it is today.

"Secondly, I would see that there is an underpass at each street crossing for the protection of children. This is something very dear to my heart and, I believe, of importance to the whole nation.

"Next on my program would be a campaign to clean up the beaches. I would see that they were made safe for children and the thousands who enjoy them. This would mean a campaign for purification and installation of breakwaters. Beaches are important to children, and they should have the right to enjoy bathing and sunshine on the beaches, without danger of infection or danger to their lives."

And so there you have the political platform of Miss Irene Dunne.

WHY I'M WAITING BEFORE MARRYING

gives him advice—that the first year of marriage is filled with adjustments, so we thought the post-military adjustments should be made first.

(If Jack Benny were reading this over my shoulder, he'd probably ask me what I meant by implying that the first year of marriage wasn't a post-military adjustment. I worked with Jack in "The Horn Blows at Midnight." After the second day on the set we were giving him a bad time by calling the picture "The Corn Grows At Midnight." Great guy, that Benny.)

Of course there are a lot of big and important changes to be made in a man's life when he goes back to mufti, but I think the little rearrangements are more fun to talk about. Take clothes, for instance: Craig had lost 30 pounds between putting on khaki and removing it. The first time I saw him in a pair of pre-war tweeds, I cased the outfit with a critical eye. "Something new?" I inquired carefully. "Are men now wearing dirndls?"

He had to admit that his belt was not ornamental, but a binding necessity. So he had to have his suits all retailored. Every time I called him for the first two weeks, he was having the alterations made. Then he began to gain weight, and some of the seams had to be let out a bit. Ah, me. When he regains his full quota of poundage, this will all have to be done over again. I'd written his tailor's number in my little black book in permanent ink.

If your man has come home from the army, probably the first thing he announced was that he intended to sleep until noon every day for the ensuing month. Craig made the same general announcement to me and to his roommate. In his case, however, it was doctor's orders.

The only trouble appears to be that a 5:30 habit has been formed. Craig arrived at my house bright and early on his first morning home, ready to drive me to the studio. He said he had awakened at the usual army time, and knew he wasn't going to be able to go to sleep again. This early rising stood him in good stead when he was working in "Since You Went Away." He was practically the first person on the set each day.

There are two very delicate subjects on which I must touch if I'm going to be honest about our postponed marriage plan. Craig is proud. He's one of the most honorable men I have ever known. When we marry, he doesn't ever want to be known as Mr. Alexis Smith. At present, because I have had a chance to work on my career while Craig's was waylaid by the war, I have a little better break. However, within a year, I know Craig's will be one of the big names in pictures. I know that the reports of our marriage—at that time—will explain who I am, because he will be so well known, and that's exactly the way I want it. I want to be Mrs. Craig Stevens.

Another genuine problem is that of income. I have never yet met a G.I. Joe who saved anything out of his monthly stipend! Craig is very definite about his desire to support his wife in the style to which he wants her to become accustomed. I admire and respect this attitude, and I'm willing to wait for Craig to sink a shaft into a gold mine.

Meanwhile, we're engaged and enjoying every moment of it. We seldom go night clubbing because the dance floors are too small to do anything except smile into the eyes of the adjacent couples. Besides, both of us are working and it's doctor's orders that Craig be in bed every night by ten. Saturday night is our night. We dissipate and stay up until eleven, sometimes twelve. And the best thing about the average night club is that first, wonderful, delicious gulp of fresh air that you get when you come out. It's like liquid diamonds flavored wtih apple blossoms. It's divine. But Craig and I have agreed that sitting in a night club for three hours is a little too heavy a penalty to pay for even that glorious sensation.

We see a lot of movies for the same reason that a dentist spends his evenings reading "The Journal Of The American Dental Association"—a magazine, incidentally, which very nearly came to be Craig's favorite literature. He started out, originally, to study dentistry at the University of Missouri. Yes, he's from Missouri, a fact that provides me with material for some corny cracks.

After a movie, we like to storm over to my house and investigate the ice box. Mother nearly always has cold chicken, which takes no points, and cheese, which does. And there's always cold milk. We build a modest sandwich—gone are the Dagwood days—and have a glass of milk while we dissect the picture we have just seen. That's one thing I will say in recommendation of marrying a man who works in the same profession as his fiancée does—the two of you always find more things to talk about than you can finish. It makes for great comradeship.

Frequently, Craig and I take long walks and talk. The other night I got started on the subject of clothes. (Any girl who wants to is hereby given permission to show this to her husband or sweetheart.) I was saying that this new suit I was having tailored didn't seem to be just right. Something was wrong with the shoulders, and the back didn't hang right, etc., etc.

We had walked about thirty blocks when I turned to Craig and said, "You're awfully quiet tonight. You haven't said a thing since we started on our walk."

He looked at me with an incredulous eye. "Are you kidding?" quoth he.

Most of the time, believe me, I don't monopolize the conversation like that. I encourage Craig to talk because he has some very entertaining ideas on the picture business—which I am not going to mention, so don't get excited.

It seems, too that—as a matron—I'm in for great athletic achievements. You know, nearly everyone looks at me in all my 5' 8" of height, and says, "I imagine you are wonderful at sports." Well, I'm not. You

Mother of Four Earns $1,000 on Her Writing

"Without jeopardizing our home life a bit, I have been able to earn $1,000 since graduating from N.I.A. If I had not the responsibility of four small children, home duties, and war work, I am sure I could have made much more. After only two lessons, I sold a garden series to Baltimore American. The N.I.A. way makes writing child's play." —Gladys Carr, Annapolis, Md.

HOW do you KNOW you can't WRITE?

Have you ever tried?

Have you ever attempted even the least bit of training, under competent guidance?

Or have you been sitting back, as it is so easy to do, waiting for the day to come when you will awaken, all of a sudden, to the discovery, "I am a writer"?

If the latter course is the one of your choosing, you probably never will write. Lawyers must be law clerks. Doctors must be internes. Engineers must be draftsmen. We all know that, in our time, the egg does come before the chicken.

It is seldom that anyone becomes a writer until he (or she) has been writing for some time. That is why so many authors and writers spring up out of the newspaper business. The day-to-day necessity of writing—of gathering material about which to write—develops their talent, their insight, their background and their confidence as nothing else could.

That is why the Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on journalism—continuous writing—the training that has produced so many successful authors.

Learn to write by writing

NEWSPAPER Institute training is based on the New York Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. Week by week you receive actual assignments, just as if you were right at work on a great metropolitan daily. Your writing is individually corrected and constructively criticized. Thoroughly experienced, practical, active writers are responsible for this instruction. Under such sympathetic guidance, you will find that (instead of vainly trying to copy some one else's writing tricks) you are rapidly developing your own distinctive, self-flavored style—undergoing an experience that has a thrill to it and which at the same time develops in you the power to make your feelings articulate.

Many people who should be writing become awestruck by fabulous stories about millionaire authors and therefore give little thought to the $25, $50 and $100 or more that can often be earned for material that takes little time to write—stories articles on homemaking, local events, gardening, fashions, business, war activities, etc.—things that can easily be turned out in leisure hours, and often on the impulse of the moment.

might as well look at a step-ladder and say, "Now there's a natural implement for ice hockey."

I never had time for games; I was always studying in school, or taking part in plays, or practicing my music lesson. More of that later.

However, Craig insists that his wife has to play good tennis and passable golf. He has started to teach me some tennis—at which he is a streak and I am a ghost. So far the golf lessons haven't begun, but I have a feeling that by the time I know the difference between a niblick and the nineteenth hole, Craig is going to endure some exasperating moments.

In turn, I sometimes get a little exasperated with Craig—in a romantic sort of way. As I mentioned above, I studied piano for eight years. Currently, if supplied with the music, I can mangle "Narcissus" or some little thing from Chopin. But, deprived of my music, I am as useless as a needleless record player.

As for Craig—well, he and I were guests at a party recently. The hostess, thinking a bit of music would enliven things, asked me to play. "Could I have some music?" I asked. Well, she couldn't find any. Several others made a tentative effort to deliver some arpeggios, but finally Craig sat down at the piano.

He plays entirely by ear; once he has heard anything—he can reproduce it. "It's so easy," he tries to tell me.

I always shake my head. "It doesn't do me any good to hear it down here on the keys, I have to see it up there on the rack."

Craig and my family get along like moon and June. One afternoon he came over and caught my mother watering the lawn. Mother is a pixie, let's face it; for some reason she was doing her gardening barefooted that day. Craig got quite a kick out of it and has called her "Tess" ever since.

At present Mother and I are auction-happy in an attempt to get furnishings together. Frequently on Sunday we attend preview showings of things to be sold Monday. We decide what would fit our decorative scheme, then Mother takes care of the bidding. You should hear her tell about it afterward. Actually she has done quite well, as we have two enchanting Victorian chairs, a Sheffield liqueur set, a set of Venetian glass wine hocks, several Chelsea porcelain figures, and a number of other proud acquisitions. Craig, like most men, is chilly about the excitement of an auction. "That old stuff!" he says. But I notice that when the antiques are set in place, he is the first to comment on how nice they look.

At present Craig and I are both working on "Doughgirls" at Warner Brothers. One of our first scenes together deals with the bewildered attempts of a couple to get married. It seems that the marriage license is missing, and after extensive brain-cudgeling, the prospective bride remembers that she has used the back of the license as a laundry list.

After we had shot the scene, Craig grinned at me. "When we do get married—actually—I have a feeling that something like that will happen."

That's a challenge, and one that I intend to meet with great calm. Personally, I'll bet Craig forgets the ring.

And I hope that we both laugh at the incident when we celebrate our golden wedding anniversary.

EYEING MR. EYTHE

the craning of necks as one model after another appeared. I was bored to tears. I hadn't recovered from that afternoon when I ran into Mr. Kaufman and his pretty daughter at a party. He wondered how I enjoyed the show. I told him what I thought. When he was able to walk again, he asked me what I suggested. I said, 'Inject a little sex into it, a little music, and some pretty girls.' The next thing I knew I was appointed producer of the dress shows at Kaufman's.

"I shall never forget that first opening. We had gathered together the prettiest freshman girls in town, constructed a runway like those at Minsky's, and to soft, sinuous music, had the girls parade along the runway. Then I made my entrance. I was in tails, silk hat and carried a cane. Only I had forgotten to roughen the soles of my new patent shoes. My entrance was striking to say the least; my progress along the runway was like that of a bowling ball making unerringly for the frame of pins. Only the pins were the gams of the lovely ladies I had gathered together. All I remember was that it was a perfect 'hit' and I fell into the lap of an Eastern buyer. Otherwise, the show was a great success. Women bought like mad, and I managed to stay on and do six shows for the next three years. But my shoes got a retread such as no pair of dress shoes ever received."

Later on, while appearing with the incomparable Sheila Barrett, the impersonator, in summer stock, Bill began to think about Television. He told Sheila about his dreams. Sheila agreed that there might be something in Television—for both of them. Thus it was that Bill and Sheila, as a team, went in search of a job.

"We got it all right, by the grace of a false courage hypo'd by several scotch and sodas and the unwitting cooperation of three sponsors who should have known better. We signed for twenty-six weeks, and were fired after the third show—because we couldn't just seem to get around to doing the commercials seriously. Shoes were our commodity, and we insisted on saying things like 'When you take off Blank's shoes, you know you've been wearing Blank's shoes—because your feet hurt.' Or we'd say, 'Build your height, with Blank's shoes and grow four feet.' The audience loved it, but the sponsors felt that something was wrong somewhere."

Not all William Eythe's experiences have been on the humorous side, however. There was, for instance, the run of "The Moon Is Down," in which Broadway play Bill created the role of Lieutenant Tonder. "We had forty-five minutes between scenes with nothing to do, and so we would run over to the 46th Street Theater where "Varieties of 1942" was playing and take in the show night after night. On one of these expeditions a blackout was proclaimed. You can imagine our feelings when one of the wardens flashed a light on us slinking along the street to our own theater—the three of us in Nazi uniform!"

Bill got out of that one all right, but there was quite another ending to a similar occurence. At the matinees of "The Moon Is Down," Bill and his Nazi-dressed friends would sit on the sidewalk near the stage door and sun themselves. They were doing this when a chauffeur came up and in a rich guttural voice said, "This play very big success, yah?"

"Oh, yah!" said Bill.

The guttural voiced chauffeur leaned forward, "Play about Germany, yah?"

"Yah, yah!" said Bill. Then he pulled himself together. "Well, it's about Norway, really. If——"

The other interrupted. "Pro-Nazi, I hear, yes?"

Bill wasn't enjoying this at all by now, and his friends were beginning to glower. "Oh well, that's what Dorothy Thompson thinks. Only——"

"Sh!" said the chauffeur, and quickly put a bunch of cards in his hand. Bill quickly showed them to Ralph Morgan, who suggested that he call up the phone number on the cards. Bill did and sure enough, he was invited to join the Bund!

"We were able to turn him in, and strangely enough, in the course of the run of the play, we turned in ten people to the F.B.I. It's an amazing thing how many people believe that an actor, because he is willing to don a Nazi uniform for the purpose of a play, is sympathetic to the cause." Bill grinned. "We soon proved them wrong."

One of William Eythe's closest friends is Anne Baxter. She, too, will not forget in a hurry that first important scene in "The Eve of St. Mark." Bill made five entrances before he got it right, and this is the true, uncensored record of those five entrances. 1: Bill hurried and tripped over a cable and fell on his face. Entrance 2: Bill tripped, collided with Anne and both came to the ground. Entrance 3: Bill made it, took a deep breath, and a button popped from his tight shirt and spoiled the take. Entrance 4: Bill said, "Oh, gee, I house we had our wish" instead of "I wish we had our house," and Entrance 5: Bill was voiceless and couldn't get a word out.

"Small wonder," explains Bill, "that Anne and I were not friends when we first met. As a matter of fact, we disliked each other intensely. I thought she was a pseudo-sophisticate and a snob, and she thought I was a ham and an imbecile. It took a kick on her shin from a clumsy movement of my foot to make us friends. She turned and said, 'Come over to my dressing room and have some pickles,' and I said to myself, 'If that girl eats pickles at ten o'clock in the morning, then she's for me.' And we've been friends ever since."

Such sudden enthusiasms for people are typical of Bill, though they often make him tongue-tied. Thus when he once took leave of Ruth Chatterton and wanted to show his gratitude for a long interview she had granted him, he said, "I am delightful!" To this day, Ruth probably doesn't know that what he meant to say was, "I am delighted."

Another Chatterton anecdote concerns the time Bill was touring Canada in "Caprice," and called on Ruth at her hotel to tell her that the set had been changed. But Ruth was too weary to speak about anything. Thus, when the play opened and Ruth made her entrance and fell flat on her face, she was furious with everyone, and Bill particularly, for not telling her that they had built three steps instead of the usual two into the stage set. "So now I mind my own business, knowing that whether I try to help or whether I don't, the results are very much the same," Bill says.

Bill is inordinately fond of slightly-touched people, plaid bathrobes, freshly scrubbed faces, garlic sandwiches, eating on the floor, airplanes, out-of-the-way places, exotic spices, girls who look equally well in blue jeans and low-cut evening gowns, Mexican foods, and cooking dinner without knowing who's coming to help him eat it.

On the other hand, he can't stand hors d'oeuvres, hats, the average woman's makeup, girdles, females with intense looks, umbrellas, squeamish souls, short evening gowns, lunch when working, soap operas, and people who eat whole slices of bread.

It all began in Mars, the small Pennsylvania town of 1200 souls, where Bill was eventually to share prominence with his older brother, Howard "Dutch" Eythe, who gained athletic fame when he won All-American football honors as a Carnegie Tech halfback. Until that happened the good people of Mars were destined to watch the progress of William Eythe with growing wonder. At the age of nine he informed all and sundry that he would be an actor and proved it, very roughly, by a more enthusiastic than inspired performance of "Peter Rabbit" at his school.

His main interest turned then to directing rather than acting. He was a "movie director" at the age of eleven, and all his spare time was devoted to making imaginary Westerns in the hills around the town. A shoe box was made to resemble a camera and young Eythe, megaphone in hand, directed with the dramatic sweep of a Cecil B. DeMille. "Leggings and all," he says proudly.

At Mars High School, Bill stuck to dramatics, but became more interested in the settings than in any roles he might be able to play. He studied scenery and costume design, and soon devised the Dramatics Class production of "Seventeen." In 1933 Bill's family moved to Baltimore and time went by rather quickly and excitingly, as time seems to have a habit of doing with Bill. In 1937 he entered Carnegie Tech.

Running the gamut of a variety of jobs, Bill got his great chance by sitting on the doorstep of his friend Oscar Serlin and getting the producer to agree to let him play the coveted role of Lieutenant Tonder in "The Moon Is Down." After that, Hollywood!

After he signed with 20th Century-Fox in New York, he deliberately stayed away from the stage production "Eve of St. Mark" because he felt that he would one day play the screen version. "Although Fox had not bought it, I still felt that way, and now that I have played the lead in it," he adds with a touch of despair, "I'm sort of sorry I didn't see it. I might have got some useful pointers on being a good actor."

Which, and the lighter side of Mr. Eythe notwithstanding, is what he most would like to be.

LESSON IN LOGISTICS:

Mrs. Brown learns why she must use less paper!

MRS. BROWN couldn't understand why Grocer White didn't wrap her loaf of bread in the usual paper bag.

Grocer White gave her the reason: because our Army needs paper for its great invasion drive.

He explained that nearly every one of 700,000 different kinds of items shipped overseas must be paper-wrapped for protection.

He told her that a Signal Corps radio, for instance, takes 10 pounds of paper to manufacture.

He told her that each propelling charge for a 155-millimeter shell takes three-fifths of a pound of paper.

He told her each 500-pound bomb takes 12 pounds of paper.

He told her the Army considers paper one of the top essentials of victory.

Mrs. Brown thanked Grocer White and vowed to help him and all his fellow merchants in their drive to use less paper.

Mrs. Brown even carries a market basket or a shopping bag now to help save precious paper bags.

Mrs. Brown has enlisted her whole family in a family paper-conservation drive. Yes, there's not a single piece of paper wasted at the Brown house.

Magazines, like this, are passed along when read so that the greatest possible number of folks can share the printed word. A mighty important aid to us magazine people who, in spite of using only 5% of the entire paper output, are managing to save more than 450 million pounds of paper by our own conservation methods.

ALAN MARSHAL

arrived with at least two tickets—and that after having stopped to put up bail at Ventura and Oxnard.

Of course he had fallen head over heels in love with Mary Grace Borel, and he courted her with an intensity and concentration that won her heart. They were married in 1939 and have a little son, Kit, who is three and a half years old.

Alan's whole life, outside his career, is devoted to his wife and little boy. The baby is a constant wonder and joy to him. Naturally a reserved and rather reticent person, when he speaks of his son he actually beams.

"Just the other day," he said, "I found Kit trying to play marbles, but he didn't know how. Neither did I, so I took pains to learn from the boys in the neighborhood. They were very patient with me—and now Kit and I can play a very presentable game." He hesitated and added rather shyly, "It's fun!"

Of course it's fun—and perhaps, through Kit, Alan is capturing some of the good times he didn't have in boarding school.

When caretakers for California lawns dwindled away and eventually disappeared, Alan became a reluctant gardener. He likes it now, though, and has added a Victory Garden to the original lawn-mowing and hedge-clipping.

"It's really been a wonderful thing," he said. "I've made such fine friends among the people who are our neighbors. I'd probably never have met them at all if it hadn't been for gas rationing and gardening.

"Why, only last week I discovered that a gopher was getting at my beets and carrots. I found the main place where he lived and tried to drown him out. I used a complicated system of cross-flooding with two hoses, but that gopher must have used the Australian crawl!

"Then the man down the street told me where to get a trap and how to bait it and the next morning there was our gopher—very, very dead."

He's gone into other things with his neighbors, too. Not only were there gophers flourishing and multiplying in several vacant lots nearby, but weeds were, too. So they all banded together to burn off the lots, each neighbor assigned to a specific job. And the sight of the immaculate and impeccable Marshal, done up in slacks and sweat-shirt and with a sooty face, directing the lines of fire, must really have been something.

In other words, Alan Marshal is a charmingly normal man and a solid citizen. He is very human and fundamentally simple at heart. He has no phobias. He isn't superstitious. He plays no hunches. The job he does in pictures is a job he's been trained for and guided in. He doesn't want to be a director or a producer or a writer. He doesn't think the screen needs uplifting; he thinks the motion picture business is just fine as it is. He'd rather be a motion picture actor than anything else.

In brief, he's a happy man, one who has found his work, his love and his ideal way of life.

HOW TO WRITE AN ORIGINAL

and eating money. The California climate is swell—as climate—but it makes a very inferior breakfast-food.

Hollywood is, among other things, the largest outdoor loopy-coop in the world. Here, one and one do not make two. They make nothing—or a scandal.

You might come here tomorrow and next week be a well-paid writer. You might also go fishing in the Pacific and catch the only gold fish in the whole ocean.

One rule, though, seems fairly well established: The surest way not to get a writing job in Hollywood is to want one—and need one.

It also seems to be true that the surest way to get to Hollywood is to go somewhere else. Or to stay where you are.

If, John or Jane, you remain in Ohio, and have a novel published, a tender story, let us say, of the love of a little boy for a moose in Colonial times, you will wake up to find yourself out here, whacking away at a picture called "The Streamlined Fiend and the Lady Werewolf" or "Dracula's Mother-in-Law."

The best plan is not for you to discover Hollywood, but to let Hollywood discover you. And it will, if you have what it wants.

Into the making of a screenplay goes a lot more talking than writing. We are talking now, Gladys Lehman and I, of a scene in which the Boy and Girl get lost in the woods and have to spend the night there. We discuss the problem of how to make this scene romantic enough to please you, and yet, not so romantic we'll get a stern note from the censors.

We are having quite a time with our Boy and Girl. It was easy to get them into the woods; but they don't seem to want to come out. We got them into an embrace, and they are still in it—and have been for a week. This will do our Boy and Girl no harm. And no good, either. They will do nothing they shouldn't, or should, till we tell them to. There have been cases where lovers have been locked in each others' arms for months, while writers debated what they should do next.

You doubtless know that to picture-writers the Boy and Girl always mean the hero and heroine, be they Mickey and Judy in "Girl Crazy," or Walter Pidgeon and Greer Garson in "Madame Curie."

Who the Boy and Girl we have left frozen in a romantic attitude will be, we do not, as yet, know. The Girl may be Esther Williams, who has shown in the picture she is making with Red Skelton, that she can act as well as she can swim. Or it may be Susan Peters, who does a lot of very good acting with Bob Taylor in "The Song of Russia". Or it may be Lana Turner.

The casting is a problem the producer has to cope with, and, in these times, with so many of our actors in uniform, it takes quite a bit of coping. But our producer, Joseph Pasternak, is an excellent coper. So we know he will get us a good Boy and Girl, once we get them out of the woods.

He will also take part in the debates which precede the actual writing of the picture, and will contribute ideas, of which he has a very large assortment.

In these debates, one of the things most frequently said will be, "Will they believe it?" "They" means you, the audience; and if you don't believe our Boy and Girl and what they do, we'd be wise to leave them in the woods till moss grows on them.

Well, we talk and talk, and sometimes we wrangle, and sometimes we roar. This process is known as "kicking the story around". At last, sometimes after months, the story, to use another technical term, is "licked," meaning it has a beginning, a middle and an end, and is, more or less believable, dramatic and antiseptic. Some stories just won't be "licked", Ted Fio Rito, bandleader and songwriter, celebrated his silver anniversary in show business this past month. Here the famous composer is looking upon a Movieland Magazine scroll awarded to him by Richard H. Roffman, right, of Hillman Periodicals. On the left is Dick Gilbert, popular singing troubadour of Station WHN on whose program citation was made.

Marvel WHIRLING SPRAY SYRINGE
AT DRUG COUNTERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

even though fresh shock-troops of writers are rushed to the front to attack it. You have, perhaps, seen it announced that presently you will see a picture, starring Garbo, or Kathryn Grayson, or Margaret O'Brien, called "Miss Pepper's Peculiar Past". But you never see it. That usually means that the story defied all efforts to kayo it and was retired to the limbo of undefeated stories. Every studio has thousands of these tough tales, whose heads are bloody but unbowed, in its dungeons.

Happily, we have got our present story licked. It gave us a hard fight for a while, but we got it groggy with punches to the heart and finished it off with a few comedy hooks.

Our next step is to write an outline or "treatment", which is a sort of blueprint of the action of the story. For example, we will say of the embracing Boy and Girl—"Tommy and Cynthia come out of their clinch, and slowly, sadly start to wend their way out of the woods. They have decided, that they cannot, they must not have a love-affair, but must say 'good-bye' and never see each other again."

Of course, they will see each other again in the last reel, but they don't know it when they slowly, sadly, etc.

However, we, the writers, know it, and we're telling you in case you were worried that the week they spent in each others' arms made them sick and tired of each other.

From this outline, the screen-play will be written.

When the screen-play is at last done, it will be about 140 typewritten pages long. Then there will be conferences with the producer and director. The script will be "cut"; that is, lines of dialogue and scenes will be amputated from it till it is the right length, about 125 pages. Writers enjoy cutting their pet scenes about as much as you'd enjoy chopping off your toes. They howl and protest; but the operation is performed—without an anesthetic. And, usually, this cutting makes for a better picture. Most pieces of writing can be cut, to advantage, including this one.

After the picture has been cut, and, possibly, rewritten and rewritten, it will be shot. Sometimes this rewriting goes on while the picture is actually being shot. Mrs. Lehman and I have written scenes in the morning for Deanna Durbin to play that afternoon. She played them, and well, too (in "Nice Girl") for she is a smart and experienced trouper. But sometimes, drastic changes are made in the story. An actress, who has been playing a sweet, pure young thing, may find, before the picture is over, that she has been turned into a loose, low character who beats up her grandmother with a baseball bat. This can be quite confusing to actors.

Walter Huston tells me that once, years ago, he played in a picture which was being put together by this jig-saw puzzle method. In one scene he had to greet his long-lost son. Naturally, he rushed to the boy and warmly embraced him.

"Don't do it that way," said the director. "Don't touch him."

"But," said Walter, "I'm supposed to love the lad! The script says so. And I've been looking for him for three reels——"

"True," said the director, "but since yesterday we've made a slight change in the boy's character. Now he has Leprosy!"

HAPPINESS IS A THING CALLED YOU

it. I suppose no one needed to!

Finally I plucked up the courage to ask one of the older girls at school what had been wrong with me. She was kind and frank. "You did look a little 1910-ish," she explained. "And then, you were probably a little young for that group, anyhow. You know how boys are!" I didn't know at all how boys "were." But I wanted to. All I knew was that I had been wrong, my clothes had been wrong, everything had been wrong. And somehow I thought that other girls had had something to do with the boys seeing how wrong I was. I kept hearing imaginary whispers.

Weeks later I talked it over with my mother. She didn't offer me any glib, ready-made solution of my difficulties. After a while she said, "You want people to like you. You think that other people can make you happy . . . by liking you, by paying attention to you, by flattering you. Well, they can't. Happiness comes from something inside you, something that you create, yourself. No one can give it to you."

I began to chant, somewhere inside of me, "Happiness—happiness is a thing called you." That's the thing I want to talk about. Because that's what it is and that's where it is. It took me years to learn. But I began right then.

First I began to learn to do things. My older brother taught me golf. I wasn't very good at it and I still am not. But it gave me one interest which was outside myself and that was new to me. My father undertook to teach me card games. I'm still fond of them . . . all kinds of them . . . and I've relaxed with them through a good many tense and difficult hours. I learned a little of badminton, tennis, learned to swim, learned to ride, learned to dance. Every time I tried something new I found someone new to share it with me. I felt myself grow a little bit and I got my mind, just that much, off my own shortcomings and problems.

When I wasn't very good at something I learned to laugh at my lack. When I was good at it, I was proud and I gained an inch or two of self confidence. But the important thing I learned was that I didn't have to depend on anyone else for my fun . . . or for my growth. I could be on my own . . . and like it.

But I wanted a successful career and you have to learn to get along with people if you are to have any such thing. That's the simple, practical truth. I might be independent of other people for my personal happiness but I still had to learn to deal with them.

I was still bitter and suspicious, particularly of other girls. But when I got my first small job I was smart enough to try to analyze and copy the girls who seemed most successful. How did they look, act, dress, think, live? It seemed to me that they had secrets and that I must try to learn them. I found that I could copy their clothes and their manners. But I couldn't figure out how they thought —these girls who seemed to meet life and people so graciously and easily and smilingly. I was actress enough, even then, so that I could pretend to a gay friendliness which I didn't feel at all. I could be smiling and gracious while I seethed with suspicion and unhappiness inside.

This was a terrible thing for me, all this distrust. When I finally managed to get into pictures, it all grew worse. This career, this chance to do the thing I had always wanted to do, seemed so precious and so important to me . . . I was so afraid that I should make a wrong move or jeopardize my opportunity in some way! I guarded my budding career so fiercely and with such terrible suspicion of everyone that I made it extremely difficult for anyone to help me.

This was long before I was married to Ronnie Reagan. He and Ann Sheridan and I were sent to a big ice skating rink to make publicity pictures. I didn't know Ann very well but I thought Ronnie was pretty nice and of course I was ready to ruffle my feathers at anything. Neither of us girls could skate, even though we were all done up in trick little costumes, and Ronnie had to hold both of us up whenever we ventured onto the ice. Ann and I just eyed one another, the way strange women so often do!

After a while she grew a bit brave and thought she'd see whether she could stand up on her skates. She took a step onto the ice and fell flat. Bang! She cut her knee and it began to bleed briskly and I thought, "Here it comes! She'll put on an act and get sympathy." I began to feel frantic inside.

But Ann sat up suddenly and howled with laughter. She was laughing, I realized, at herself, at her own clumsiness, at the ridiculous figure she had cut. In that instant I knew that I liked her. I rushed over to her, all full of sympathy she wouldn't have. She made me laugh, too, and the pair of us sat there, roaring like idiots.

Afterward she confessed that she had disliked and distrusted me as much as I had her. But we've been close friends ever since!

The next thing was when I was borrowed by Twentieth Century-Fox for "Footlight Serenade" which starred Betty Grable. I had known Betty when we were both in stock at Paramount; but that has been a long time ago and she had had a lot of success and this was her home studio. The first day I slunk onto the set and sat in a corner, uneasy, apprehensive, half expecting to have my feelings hurt and very ready to resent it if they were. Presently Betty came in, surrounded by hairdressers, photographers and publicity people. She really made an entrance! And about three minutes later she spied me in my corner, gave a little squeal and rushed over to give me a lovely, warm welcome and to introduce me to everyone.

It was wonderful. I was at ease, I was happy and I knew I had another woman friend whom I liked and trusted.

Then, of course, Ronnie really came into my life. It was his easy friendliness which attracted me to him first. Everyone liked him and it seemed to me that he liked nearly everyone. I began to try to analyze what it was in me that he liked . . . and to try to have more of it! I began to analyze whatever there was in me that anyone else could like, too, and to wonder what traits I could acquire which would attract people. In the natural course of events, my husband and my daughter absorbed my attention when I was not working.

Then came the awful days after Ronnie went into the service. There were those long, empty hours when Maureen was asleep and I was really alone. I really had to work at happiness then."

"Look, Wyman," I said to myself. Ronnie's away and you're on your own. You can't take it out in parties, new frocks, new things for the house, theater—even music. Life is pretty drab. Well—look around you!"

One of the things I saw was a lonely woman who, a year or so ago, took a motherless child into her home "just for a month." She wasn't used to children and this waif had had no training in manners or obedience. The first month was pretty bad. But now the two are devoted and my friend has just one fear, the fear that something will take the child from her. She, herself, has grown, expanded. She has new work, new friends, new contacts, new ambition. On an impulse she did a kind and generous thing and it has turned into the most important thing that ever happened to her.

Another thing I saw was a girl whose husband was fighting in the Pacific. She let off steam by digging like mad and planting a rose garden. Presently her roses attracted the attention of an older woman who lived nearby. The two became friends and now they are writing a book together, certainly a worthwhile thing for both of them!

How can we wives escape from boredom, monotony, depression while our men are away? Most actors exhaust their hours and themselves with camp shows, the Canteen, any sort of war work, so long as it is hectic and useful and absorbing. But perhaps you find yourself with a mere afternoon to spare, an unexpected one. You can read or sew or listen to music. But you can do those things, anyhow, around the edges of your other occupations. This is when you need a good, brisk hobby.

One girl I know who never cooked in her life before, has learned to make bread. She is so proud of this accomplishment that she makes it for all her friends. (And do they like it!) She insists that it is a most soothing hobby and that she can always work off a "mood" if she can just get her hands on a cake of yeast!

Well, I say that everyone has within him some instrument, some means to create happiness for himself. Whether you write poetry, make bread, sing an aria, obey a kind impulse or paint the garden furniture for your own personal outlet, depends on you and your talents and limitations.

But you must do something to take your mind off the anxious, impatient, self-controlled little core that so many . . . so very many . . . of us have buried somewhere inside us. Then when you are relaxed, when the tension is gone, you'll find that the people around you are kind and easy to know and easy to like.

You'll be at peace and I know you'll be happy.

MY PAL PAULETTE

because she thought it was one time they needed all the cheer and entertainment they could get.

My favorite recollection of my pal Paulette is always going to date back to the recent surprise "coming-out party" my appendix staged in New York. Wrapped up in those hectic two weeks are all the things I value most in my best friend—her clear-headedness, her staunchness, her capacity for putting other people's troubles ahead of her own—and most of all, her gay, utterly individual way of keeping all these sterling qualities from getting stuffy . . .

Right after I attended the President's Birthday Party in Washington, I planned to go to New York to see Paulette before leaving for Hollywood. Paulette was busy with the final preparations for a plan she'd cherished for some two years—to get overseas to China, and India, and all the most difficult spots our boys are stationed.

Immediately following my last meal at the White House (and I hope this won't sound anti-Administration!) I began to feel badly, and by the time I got to New York, the going was definitely rocky. I remember Paulette coming into my hotel room, taking one look at me and saying, "Look, you're sick—I'm going to get a doctor." She got not one, but three—standing doggedly up to the first fellow and saying, "If you say the appendix has to come out, I believe you—but I'm going to check with a couple of other doctors, too. Things like this are important——"

Which is how it happened that when I went to the hospital I had not only Paulette's personal physician, but Constance Collier's and Barney Baruch's, too. And I might say that my entrance into that hospital was really one of those Goddard "events." She was scared white when they carried me out of the hotel room on a stretcher, but with complete presence of mind she insisted they carry along a huge basket of red roses—for appearance sake. Then, when they were half-way down the hall she raced out calling, "Wait——" and with a grand gesture, ran up and threw an ermine coat across me! Up—or down—my responsibilities as a "public character" were going to be fulfilled.

The minute I was able to take calls, people from all over New York began phoning. "Paulette told me to," they'd say, "She says you might be lonesome!" She was there every day—in spite of the fact that she was at this time taking her overseas shots—typhoid and tetanus, and all those things that make strong men just want to lie around and groan. She never came without a gift—a bed jacket, a hair ribbon, something different in flower arrangements she'd shopped for—and always, a new and funny story.

When I came out of the hospital, it was all arranged that I recuperate at her farm in Spring Valley, N. Y.—and no protests. This is the farm she bought when it was pretty run down, you know, and put on a paying basis. She furnishes almost all the vegetables and fowl for Club 21 and several other restaurants, and quite a few people have asked her to take over the managements of their estates.

Which brings me to the Things You Wouldn't Have Guessed About Goddard. The really amazing part of her personality is the talent she has for organization, both in her private and public life. If Paulette has one axiom for living, it's "Sight your objective and go right to it." I haven't heard her express it in words but you couldn't be around her very much without seeing it work out, in ways both large and small. From the time she played her first screen role, she was determined her career should steadily grow bigger and better. Although she never seems to "work" at working, she's constantly improving herself. She took dramatic lessons, French and singing lessons, she cultivated writers, producers, cameramen, people who could teach her something.

Her favorite role, I think, is the one she played in "So Proudly We Hail." The character wasn't much—just a giddy girl—when she took it. Before the picture was over she had put so much of herself in it, the role was an outstanding one. That part about the black lace nightgown was her own touch—remember how she ran back to get it in the face of death from the Japs? It turned out to be one of the most human and important incidents in the story.

She's a person who has learned to make up her mind. She has a way of considering any problem, deciding it the way she believes is right, and sticking to it no matter what the temptation to exercise her woman's prerogative. For a gal who wastes a lot of time bouncing from one indecision to another (me) she's a wonderful example, and her judgment is so good you'd be willing to take her advice on anything.

Punctuality—for herself—is an unbreakable rule. Yet, you can bounce in a half hour late and she'll never fix you with a sad eye and say, "Why, Jinx—where have you been?" You can take her way of living—or leave it—only after you've seen the smooth way it works out, you're willing to subscribe.

When working on a picture 9:30 is her bedtime—and she's not fooling. Up until 9:15 she'll knit, or lie on the floor and study scripts, or sit on the edge of her chair rattling off conversation, hands flying and eyes sparkling—but she'd never think of starting off on a long anecdote at 9:25. Paulette loves to go barefoot around the house—every night when she comes in from a long day's work at the studio, the shoes come off almost immediately and are placed neatly at the bottom of the staircase. Precisely at 9:30 she's going up that staircase, those two little shoes in hand.

Her home is a medium-sized, secluded house perched up in Coldwater Canyon, and there's no tennis court or swimming pool. She originally bought it for an investment, and then grew to love the wonderful view and the beautiful trees so much she decided to live in it. The furnishings are gay and casual, and in such perfect taste you have to think a minute before you can describe any one piece

Tired Kidneys Often Bring Sleepless Nights

Doctors say your kidneys contain 15 miles of tiny tubes or filters which help to purify the blood and keep you healthy. When they get tired and don't work right in the daytime, many people have to get up nights. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder. Don't neglect this condition and lose valuable, restful sleep.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may also cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

of furniture that you see there.

She likes white rugs, brightened with soft greens and yellows, comfortable chairs, big round sofas, and pillows by the fireplace. Her bedroom is in gray and white, with touches of sunny yellow—and always a vase of red roses or camellias. The red roses throughout the house, and the wonderful Riviera painting of herself hanging in the living room, are the things you remember best. The painting is truly Mexican, with Paulette in white, painted against a background of reds and pinks and a barefooted Mexican girl combing her hair. Her particular joy is a slot machine in the playroom, which she keeps filled with money and then plays at feverishly, trying to cash in on herself!

I think the simplicity of her living is best illustrated by the time we were both weekend guests at a Texas oilman's mansion. When we walked in and were practically bowled over by its luxury, Paulette nudged me. "Gee," she whispered, "this looks like a movie star's home!"

The Goddard instinct for clothes is remarkable. She does things no one else would think of doing and they always turn out to be the right things. It's true that her jewel collection is fabulous, but a lot of her ideas have been copied in less expensive ways. For instance, she was the first person to take jewelled charms off a bracelet and set them in a gold compact—an idea that's now a fad. One night when we were going out, she tied a velvet band around her head, took a dozen pairs of earrings and clipped them on in a jewelled fringe. I've seen that copied, too. She has a black jersey formal that's bare on one shoulder and ties on the other shoulder in a large, soft knot. Some women would have perched a clip stiffly on top the knot—Paulette took a wide gold and emerald bracelet and encircled it. Don't be surprised if soon a lot of women are wearing their bracelets on their shoulders.

She can put the same individuality into a $3.95 playsuit. She'll tie a striped sash around the waist pirate fashion, put a clip on the shoulder and you'll never know it's the same outfit. She's always willing to share her ideas. She'll say, "Why don't you pin your hair back, this way, or wear your flowers, that way?" and bang, you've got a brand-new effect.

She never wears stockings or uses perfume—in fact, there isn't even a bottle of cologne in her house. And nothing goes to waste when she's around.

Take all these qualities and add them up—try to picture a girl who's witty and down-to-earth, who's happy-hearted and keen-thinking in a kaleidoscopic sort of a way, and you'll have some idea of why she's so much fun to be around.

Romance? Well, a girl as human as Paulette is bound to have her "crushes"—and plenty of them. Of course the perfect "twist" for her well-plotted life would be to have her fall crazily, haphazardly in love with some fellow who has neither rhyme nor reason. Could be—but I don't think so. She's the one person I know who can love with her head and her heart at the same time. She likes intelligent, creative, worthwhile men—I'm sure she'd have to admire a man before she could seriously love him.

a painter, a reporter, a concert pianist and a Shakespearean actress. Their last name happens to be Angel, therefore the title, "And the Angels Sing."

You would have reason to believe that with Dorothy Lamour, Betty Hutton, Diana Lynn and Mimi Chandler as the Angels, and with Fred MacMurray as an aggressive band leader in the mixup, the picture would be jam-packed with laughs. Affairs get out of hand so that the laughs become giggles and everything but the singing goes flat. The highlights are Betty's knockdown, drag-out renditions of "Blue birds in My Belfrey" and "Rocking Horse." Otherwise it is a little too bad, for things should have been all to the good in this little comedy number.

UP IN MABEL'S ROOM (United Artists) harks back to the era of the popularity of bedroom farces on the New York stage. Actually this one is twenty-five years old and was later followed, in the days of A. H. Woods and Avery Hopwood, by such items as "Getting Gertie's Garter" and others too numerous to count. It has, of course, been sharply brought up to date with references to current wartime conditions, and cast within an inch of its life with nice people such as Marjorie Reynolds, Dennis O'Keefe, Gail Patrick, Mischa Auer, Charlotte Greenwood, Lee Bowman, John Hubbard and Binnie Barnes. But "Up In Mabel's Room's" much-too-familiar plot structure sadly creaks with age.

SHOW BUSINESS (RKO) marks Eddie Cantor's initial effort as a film producer. He also plays a leading part in the story, which is not his own biography, although it might well be, so closely do the incidents parallel many actual experiences of his thirty years as an entertainer. The picture opens in 1914 when burlesque was in its heyday. Cantor is discovered on amateur night in Miner's Bowery Theatre by a performer with whom he teams and graduates to vaudeville. There is a serious romance for his partner and a comedy one for Eddie as the act gathers momentum and gets to the big time, eventually to Ziegfeld's musical smash, "Whoopee."

The cameraderie of show folks, which is the underlying theme of the story, is actually demonstrated by the presence of George Murphy in the role of Cantor's teammate. It was Eddie who gave George his start in pictures with a part in "Kid Millions," and Murphy never forgot the obligation. His singing and dancing do much to carry this show over its weaker moments, and there is that priceless clown, Joan Davis, for sheer hilarity. She is without equal in making something out of nothing. Constance Moore, just back to Hollywood from a solid hit on Broadway, is not flattered by the unbecoming pre-World War I costumes, but does well enough with song and dance. People who have never liked Eddie Cantor on the screen will revise their opinion of him in this down-to-earth portrayal.

PREVIOUSLY RECOMMENDED:

GOING MY WAY (Paramount) inspired entertainment in which Bing Crosby draws a superbly honest character of a Roman Catholic priest. Of cherished memory is Barry Fitzgerald's performance.

THE WHITE CLIFFS (MGM) stirring emotional drama that warns England and America to fight on for a good peace—"a peace that will stick." Sensitive portrayal by Irene Dunne.

THE ADVENTURES OF MARK TWAIN (Warners) humanized biography of America's beloved humorist who left a heritage of fun for all mankind. Brilliant impersonation by Fredric March.

BUFFALO BILL (20th Century-Fox) Hey, fellers, Injuns! Joel McCrea really swell as the picturesque Cody in a film that does justice to the noble redman.

FOLLOW THE BOYS (Universal) a picture that gives the general public a comprehensive idea of the entertainment world's contribution to the war. An all-star cast that is really all-star.

COVER GIRL (Columbia) one of the best filmusicals ever made. A gay, lilting extravaganza in which Rita Hayworthy and Gene Kelly dance as has no other team since Astaire and Rogers parted company.

UP IN ARMS (Goldwyn-RKO) for its musical comedy introduction to a terrific entertainer named Danny Kaye. There's Dinah Shore, too.

SONG OF BERNADETTE (20th Century-Fox) a spiritually uplifting screen masterpiece that tells of miracles wrought by indestructible faith. Jennifer Jones won the Academy Award for her Bernadette.

SEE HERE, PRIVATE HARGROVE (MGM) first highly enjoyable comedy of rookies in training. Robert Walker a hit in the title role.

PHANTOM LADY (Universal) a little murder mystery that is scoring the surprise success it richly deserves.

MARRIAGE IN HOLLYWOOD

married bandleader Artie Shaw And after her divorce from Shaw, there was Tony Martin's dark handsomeness to complement her luscious blondeness at the cafe tables Then, after rumors of reconciliation with Shaw, she suddenly switched to Tommy Dorsey's brand of romantic music

The town looked at tall, intelligent, young Steve when he appeared—and liked what they saw. Lana is well loved around the Metro lot. Most of the grips and technicians "would die for her," and many of her fellow players would be willing to make a picture with her without pay, just for the fun it entails. There had been talk, however, that her movie bosses would like her to stay out of the cafes and out of the newsprint, so when she married well-mannered, well-backgrounded Steve, her friends both great and small said, "This is it," and wished her happiness.

It was a real shock then, when trouble over Crane's first marriage arose. Then, as if it were all part of a movie plot, Crane was able to straighten out his personal difficulties, and boy got girl again. When boy and girl got small Cheryl Christina, the "beautiful, adorable, perfect" baby, it seemed a perfect finale.

Just why this hard-won love couldn't last is again purely a matter of guess-work. Certainly these two youngsters had a lot in common. Music, light and laughter are a necessity to both, their social life was as gay after marriage as before. Yet, said Steve, "Lana is all sweet—with nothing superficial about her. She is a smart little lady, knowing especially how to manage a husband, a home and a baby. I didn't fall in love with Lana Turner, the glamorously beautiful screen star, but with a girl I wanted for my wife. It is as my wife that I think of her, and I'm humbly happy to say, that is the way she thinks of herself."

Just before the current break-up, there were column items to the effect that Crane, recently given an honorable discharge from the Army, would seek a movie career "on his own, and without trading on his wife's name or influence." Could be that here again, a difference in public status might have had its effect on private happiness. Steve, it is interesting to note, has been signed by Columbia Pictures, and the entire lot, from stenos to executives, is wildly enthusiastic about his charm and ability.

Rumored also, is a new romance for Lana. Personally, we wouldn't want to make a bet for or against the rumor.

All in all, you can take these two broken marriages, strip them of their glamorous background and glittering names, and you'll find the same basic troubles that could—and are—causing divorces in towns all over the world. Or, you can retain the glamour and glitter, add to that the pressure of continuous publicity, consider the intensity of people who work all day at creating intensified emotion, and you have a pretty good case for marriage in Hollywood!

and reed sections stood out particularly. Betty Bonney, former Les Brown oriole, is the featured vocalist, and good, too. The band is only a few months old, but if they keep up their "We gotta make good" spirit, they should do all right. Frankie was very happy because he was signed for the new Old Gold Wednesday show over CBS, and will be so-starred with Allan Jones. It was quite a coup for Carle to land this program, because several big name outfits were auditioned.

New York's "older" set is hysterical over Carl Brisson, the ex-Paramount movie star, now singing at the Club Versailles. The grown-up gals sigh and swoon for Brisson just as their younger sisters do for the bobby sox crooners. He is laughingly tabbed "The Matron's Sinatra."

ON THE BEAM:

Paul Whiteman has taken over the baton on the "Connee Boswell Presents" program over the Blue Network . . .

Baritone Barry Wood is the star of the new "Palmolive Party" Saturday show over NBC. It's a half-hour variety dish with Patsy Kelly and a guest star each week, and replaces the "Million Dollar Band" clambake previously heard at that time . . .

Your old friends, "The Modernaires," are working several New York radio shows and making lots of transcriptions. Their interpretation of "Holiday for Strings" is one of the most thrilling vocal arrangements I've ever heard. Lillian Lane is pinch-hitting for Paula Kelly while Paula takes time off to welcome Dr. Stork . . .

Remember Harry Cool, one of the mainstays of the old Dick Jurgens band? He has replaced Dick Haymes on Columbia's "Here's to Romance" show. Rumor has it that Dick went off the program after some dispute between the sponsor and Dick's new boss, Twentieth Century-Fox. Anyway, I hope he'll be back on the air soon.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

The Victor Company has a couple of killer albums you'll want to own if you've been following the bands for any length of time. The first one is "Up Swing" and presents the bands of Benny Goodman, Tommy Dorsey, Artie Shaw (his old outfit) and Glenn Miller. The tunes are the eight big swing hits from 1936 to 1943, starting with Goodman's "Stompin' At The Savoy" and ending with Miller's "String of Pearls." Another good thing about this set is that the complete band personnel is listed on each disc. A lot of the sidemen now have bands of their own.

The companion album to "Up Swing" is "Smoke Rings," and this one gives us the eight top ballad hits from 1936 to 1943, from "These Foolish Things" by Benny Goodman and Helen Ward to Miller's "Old Black Magic." The same orchestras as in the above album plus Ellington, Larry Clinton, Freddie Martin and Sammy Kaye . . .

Perry Como's latest Victor release is "I Love You" and "Long Ago and Far Away" and once more he is accompanied by a mixed vocal chorus. I enjoy Como's singing very much, but I'll be glad when the musicians' union thing is settled so he can record with a live orchestra again . . .

Victor has reissued two Lena Horne sides which she made with Charlie Barnet several years ago—"Good For Nothin' Joe" and "Haunted Town." "Joe" is possibly the best record Lena ever made, but I may be prejudiced because she is a particular favorite of mine . . .

The King Sisters swing out on "Milkman, Keep Those Bottles Quiet" and "San Fernando Valley." On "Milkman" the sound effects you hear are provided by real milk bottles with the real stuff in them. In fact, while making the record, the top came off one of the bottles and Yvonne was splattered from head to toe. The girls are enthusiastic about the "Valley" song because all four of them have homes in the San Fernando Valley in California, and Alyce and Louise have opened a dress shop there . . .

Decca's newest Dick Haymes offering is "Gertie From Bizerte" and "There's a Star Spangled Banner Waving Somewhere," with vocal assistance from The Song Spinners. The character, Gertie, originated among the boys in the Army who went to North Africa, and the song is one of the funniest to come out of the war. The second side is a hillbilly standard, but it has worked its way into public favor.

Louis Jordan is hopping right along in popularity and his new Decca platter shouldn't slow him down any. It's "G. I. Jive," Johnny Mercer's big hit, and "Mop! Mop!" which is a musician's expression for a double drum beat. Jordan does both vocals.

The Ink Spots' latest release is "Someday I'll Meet You Again" and "I'll Get By" (As Long As I Have You). "I'll Get By" is the newest old song to get the revival treatment, following in the footsteps of "As Time Goes By" and "My Ideal" . . .

The Decca people have been busy little bees, signing all kinds of artistic talent, including Charles Boyer, Ginger Rogers, Charles Laughton and Phil Baker. Each of them has been contracted to make a series of recordings, such as scenes from plays, episodes from their hit pictures, etc. Decca has also nabbed Gary Moore, Jimmy Durante's radio partner, to wax some of his amusing dialogues . . .

Columbia has dug up two old Harry James' pressings with Sinatra vocals and put them back to back, "Every Day of My Life" and "A Little Street in Singapore." These were both released separately about three years ago when Frank was Harry's vocalist, but if you don't already own them and you like these two guys, you'll want this record.

Well, Kiddies, I've shot my wad for this time. And I must hurl myself onto the train and head for dear old Hollywood. See you next month about the same time. In the meanwhile, if you have any little musical tid-bits you want straightened out, just drop me the fast note and enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope — Jill Warren, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California.

"COSMETIC CLOSE-UPS"

THE smile that's sincere is completely spontaneous, entirely unhampered by any selfconsciousness. It's a very important part of your personality! But a grin that's warm and ready calls for tidy looking teeth. So "brush up" on your dental duties—personal and professional.

There's no need to dread the dentist if you see him often enough. Two or three times a year, depending on how rapidly your teeth collect stains and tartar deposits, have a thorough cleaning and examination for cavities.

Tooth decay and disaster, if left uncovered, may result in serious disease, particularly of the digestive organs. So when X-rays or examination discover damage, take your treatment—promptly.

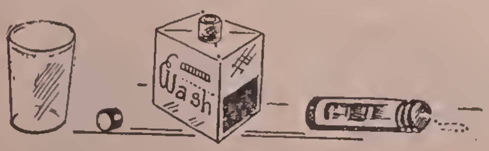
It's precaution that prolongs—not just the lustre, but the life of your teeth. A little filling now and then can prevent extremes of extraction. The tooth that can't be saved should usually be replaced, whether or not you have a space that shows.

Don't depend on your dentist to do it all! The daily dos and don'ts of dental care are up to you. For one thing, bring your brush technique up to date.

Your trusty toothbrush should be firm and dry. Buy two at a time and give them a breathing spell between workouts. Choose a dentrifice that appeals in taste and texture. Just be sure the brand is one of the best, known to and recommended by dentist and druggist.

Beginning with perfect props, you must continue with the correct kind of stroke, one that will cleanse all surfaces and stimulate the gums. Here's how. Use a slightly rolling motion that starts from the base of the gums and sweeps right over the teeth. Always move the brush in the direction that your teeth grow—down over the top row, up over the bottom.

Follow through with dental floss to take out stubborn specks of food. Insert it gently between the teeth, keeping a firm grip on the floss so that it doesn't jam up against the gums and bruise or tear them. Finish off with refreshing mouthwash. Slosh it about, around and around, to carry away all those dislodged particles of debris.



Remember, your dentist twice a year or more. Your own mouth hygiene habits twice a day or oftener. The result will be perfect teeth—and a prettier you.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S
The LION'S ROAR
TWENTY YEARS OF LEADERSHIP
MGM
Published in this space every month
The greatest star of the screen!

King Vidor, who directed "The Big Parade", the first outstanding MGM picture twenty years ago, now delivers to the same company, as an Anniversary gesture, his mighty production "An American Romance".

★ ★ ★ ★

This film is the flesh and blood story of the American dream come true.

★ ★ ★ ★

It's about a guy called Steve Dangos, a young immigrant who came to this land of freedom with his bare hands and a shining hope. (Brian Donlevy gives all his sincerity to this role.)

★ ★ ★ ★

It's also about a girl called Anna O'Rourke. Who shared in the struggles, the tribulations, the dreams of her man, as he made it the hard way, from iron mine worker, steel puddler, factory worker to great industrialist.

★ ★ ★ ★

While their story is intimate, personal, glowing, it is also symbolic of the fight, the love, the surge, the drama, that has made our way of life the wonder of the whole, wide world.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is the big adventure, told in wonderfully human and exciting terms—in a robust screen play by Herbert Dalmas and William Ludwig.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is dramatic fiction. It is also the truth. For this story in its scope parallels the life stories of many men who have helped to make America great.

★ ★ ★ ★

King Vidor has found the movie material that many directors have been reaching for ever since the beginning of films. What he has done with it is magnificent.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is photographed in perfected Technicolor. Red-brown earth tones of Mesabi; fiery reds and yellows of Steel Town; the bluish-gray colors of the automobile factories; the bright sky-blues of America's conquest of the heavenly skies above, follow in storied sequence.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" has caught the mighty cadences of the American dream. Something of you, yourself, is surely in it.

★ ★ ★ ★

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

WE'LL GIVE YOU A TIP

Rita Hayworth, perhaps the happiest expectant mother in Hollywood, will have her baby before the announced November. Her studio put out the far away date so that people wouldn't think she shouldn't do another picture. Rita and Orson want a little girl, and are planning it that way.

BELYING THOSE RUMORS

Betty Grable, cooking for her husband Harry James, in a tiny kitchenette in the Hotel Astor. Harry was in New York on tour, and it was the first separation the Jameses had had since their marriage. When Betty got her household settled, and her mother to take care of little Vicky, she hied herself off quick to join him. (P. S.—Harry gained at least five pounds, which speaks well for his wife's cooking!)

FOR THE WISTFULS, HOPEFULS

You might as well give up, for they're both going to marry. Major Clark Gable (note the promotion) now openly admits that he is more than interested in the very beautiful Kay Williams, and this is the first time he's even mentioned anything serious about any woman for a long time. Meanwhile, the way is also being paved for Olivia de Havilland to marry Captain John Huston. Mrs. Huston is securing a divorce. The couple had been separated before Livvy met the dashing captain, but the settlement had not been made. Now it has, and Livvy will be a bride at last—much to the sorrow of every bachelor in movieland.

COMES IT NOW, AT LAST

Dave Rose has finally consented to Judy Garland's getting a divorce. Ever since their separation Judy has wanted to be legally free, but Dave wouldn't give the necessary approval. Some say Gloria de Haven has something to do with his changing his mind—in which case, you'd call it "a change of heart"?

YOU CAN COUNT ON

Ann Sheridan's marrying Steve Hanagan, when she returns from her trip overseas. Ann stopped off in New York before she left the country, and authoritative circles report that two plain gold bands were chosen at that time. . . . The continuation of the Lupe Velez and Arturo de Cordova romance. They plan to be married as soon as Arturo can secure some release from his marriage in Mexico. . . . Marlene Dietrich's usually getting what she's after. When she went overseas to entertain the troops, she wanted to see Jean Gabin. And she did—in Africa.

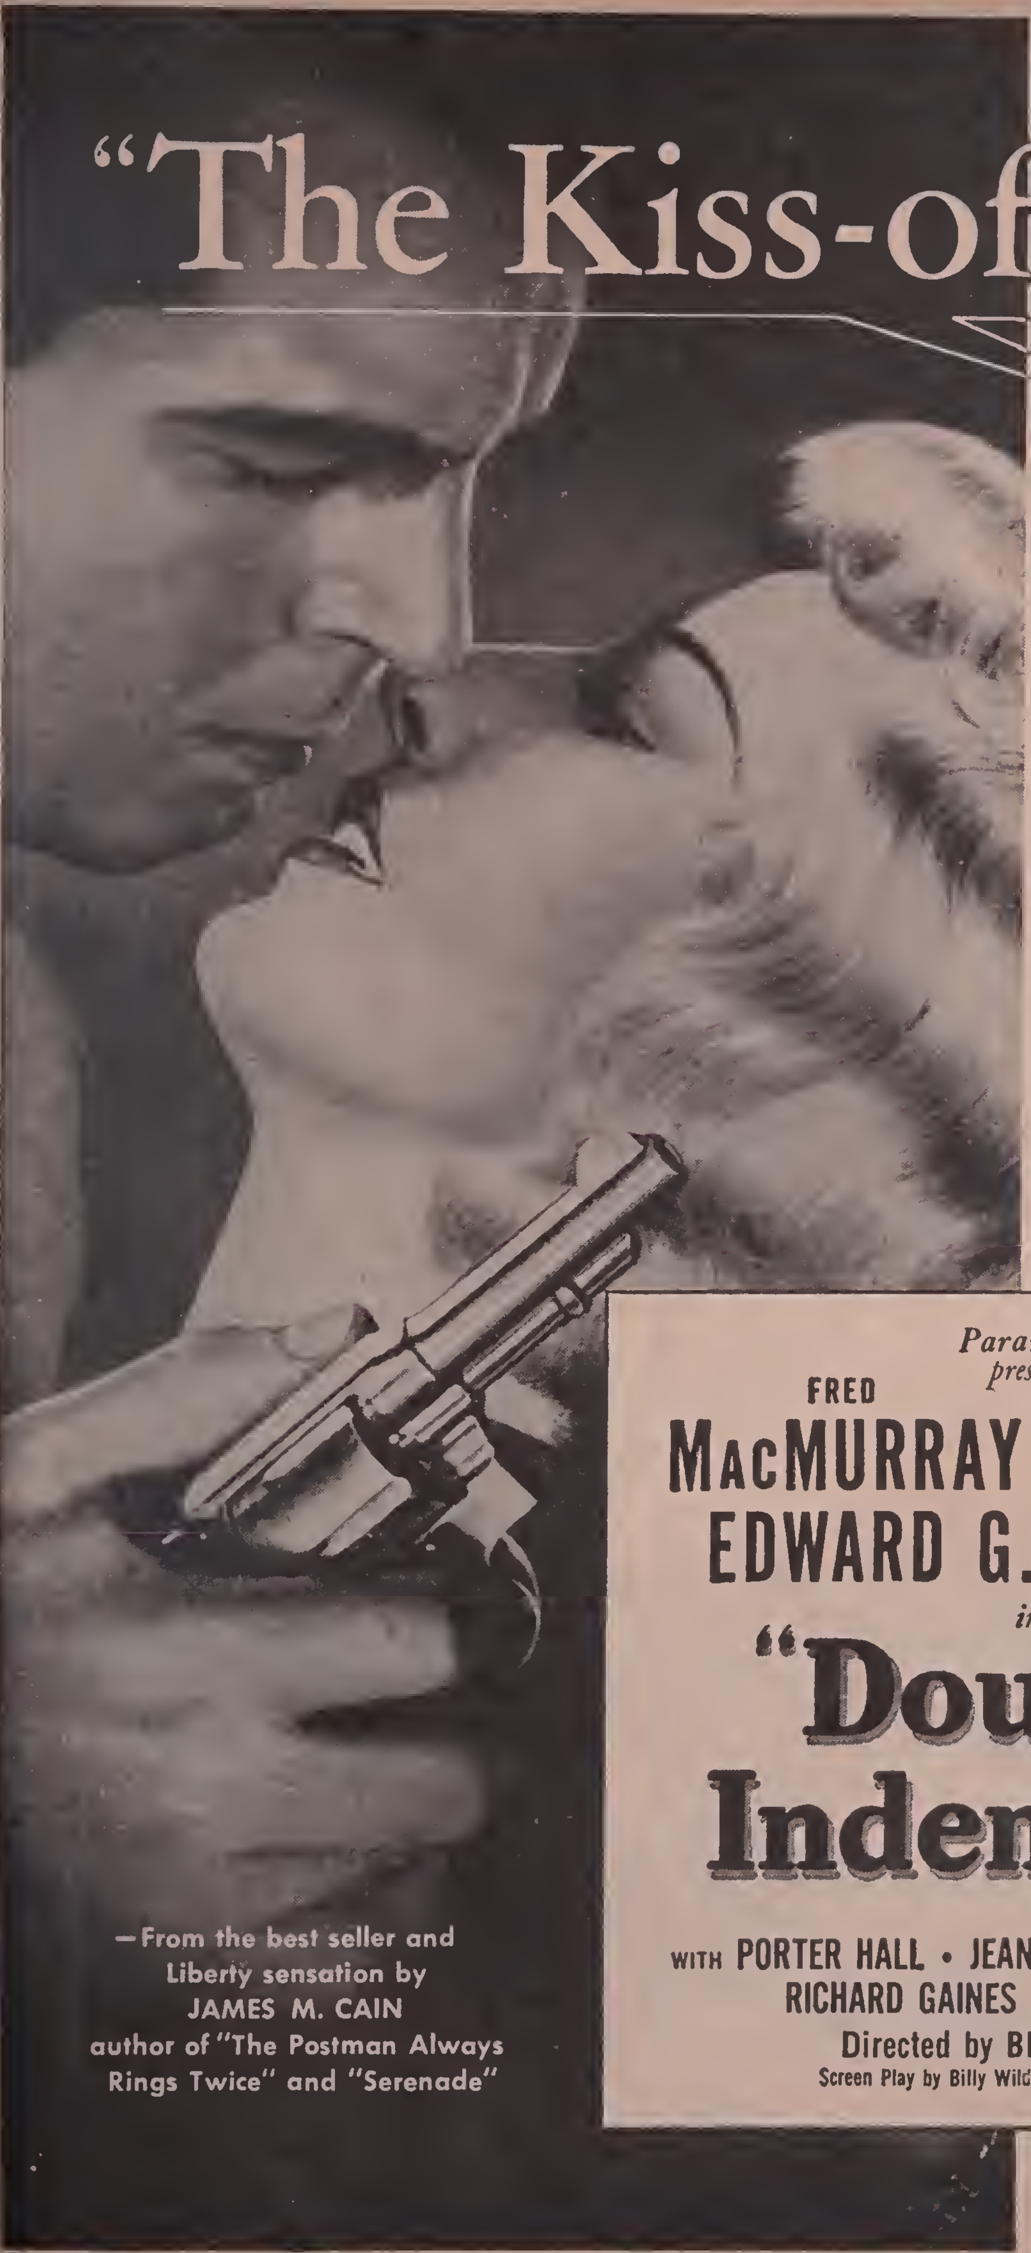
Marjorie Reynolds is lucky that way! Her service man husband, Capt. Jack Reynolds, happens to be stationed near Hollywood.

Script-studying and too busy to eat. At home, when not working, Carey and Barbara like meals served in their upstairs bed-sitting room.

"The Kiss-off!"



"Yes, it was the kiss-off for both of them. They had gone too far... they had tried to get away with murder and they found they couldn't get away from me!"

IT'S SURE TO HAPPEN

☆ No matter what they say, Kathryn Grayson and John Shelton will get a divorce, almost before this is printed. Her studio will heave a big sigh of relief when this is finally settled, for they have been more than understanding in the Sheltons' marital mixup. However, when it finally happens, Metro will start to build Kathryn in the big roles they think she can handle. Heretofore, although they knew they had a valuable property in the little singer, they never knew from one minute to the next what was going to happen in her private life—and that isn't the way movie stars are made.

SO SORRY, MISS STANWYCK?

☆ Barbara Stanwyck, who is not readily recognized when she goes out in public, called on the manager of an apartment house to try to locate living quarters for some friends arriving from the East. The manager gave her the usual third-degree.

"Have you any children, dogs, other pets—such as a canary?"

"No," said Stany, strictly straight-pan, "but I have a pair of shoes which squeak a little!"

YOU'LL SEE A DIFFERENCE

☆ Watch for an improvement in Veronica Lake. Someone has finally taken Miss One-eye and read the riot act to her, and she is beginning to behave. Ronnie has never been one of the easiest people to handle, and for a couple of months gave her bosses lots of trouble. But a certain executive finally told her off—or else—and she listened. Now she can begin to see the light of day from beneath that peek-a-boo bang again.

WHERE TO FIND THE STARS

☆ Frank Sinatra, driven by his gentleman's gentleman, can be caught each day in the early morning and early evening, driving over Cahuenga pass to and from his Toluca Lake home. Frankie bought a charming farmhouse set right on Toluca Lake, and has lots of movie stars as his neighbors. . . . Walter Pidgeon, going to Finlandia Baths about three times a week, about four-thirty in the afternoon. . . . Dennis Morgan, shopping at least once a week for gardening equipment. . . . Hedy Lamarr and John Loder, at the Hollywood Canteen EVERY Friday night, without fail. . . . Dick Arlen, in a gas station on Sunset Blvd. and Clark Street, tinkering with his station wagon. . . . The Robert Youngs, with their little daughters, at the Cock and Bull on Tuesdays for lunch. . . . Brian Donlevy, at Malibu Beach mending the fence around his house and doing general chores. . . . Alan Ladd and his Susie, at the first table at the Hollywood Brown Derby, entertaining about twice a week. . . . Errol Flynn, at the Beverly Hills Tennis Club, winning practically every set from the professional.

"The DuBarry Success Course has all the answers!"

—says Mrs. Helen Davis of Ann Arbor, Mich.

Time and again Helen Davis had tried to reduce—lost a few pounds only to put them back on. After her baby came, she found she weighed 143. Something had to be done, so she enrolled for the DuBarry Success Course. "I lost 23 pounds, gained a figure I'm proud of," says Mrs. Davis. "My skin was dry and coarse-looking; now it is soft, fine-textured and clear. I want to rush up to every overweight girl I see and tell her about the Course."

Before After

Mrs. Davis looks years younger since she began this new way of living.

COMING SOON—
SINCE YOU WENT AWAY—

David O. Selznick's "all star cast" production.

But Previewed Too Late To Be Reviewed in This Issue

Originally ran four hours, but was pared down to three by the time it came out of the cutting room. Release delayed by some last-minute rewriting of scenes, but promises to be gloriously sterrific!

OH, WHAT A NIGHT (Monogram) seems a fitting title, in that the story of the fabulous Kimberley King diamond really takes place all "of an evening," at what started out to be merely a dinner party. The scene, the fashionable California Hotel; the cast, a lot of international jewel thieves; and the action—plenty! Jean Parker, Edmund Lowe and Marjorie Rambeau are all very much involved in the whole situation, which turns out to be that after much competition among the thieves as to who's going to steal the precious bauble, it's returned to its rightful owner.

SUMMER STORM (Angelus-UA) is Producer Seymour Nebenzal's adaptation of the stage drama Anton Chekov originally titled "The Shooting Party." As Russian as Chekov himself would have been able to make it, but making no attempt to propagandize for the U.S.S.R. That in itself is enough to recommend the picture, in the opinions of some.

But better yet, it's a masterpiece of good casting, excellent photography, and effective psychological climaxes—of which there are several. George Sanders gives one of the finest performances of his career, and there could have been no better choice as the judge, who's torn between the code of his class and a mad desire for a girl (Linda Darnell). Anna Lee is Sanders' fiancee, loving him but not able to understand the spell which is destined to bring about his destruction. Edward Everett Horton is the decadent nobleman on whose estate the story takes place, and Hugo Haas is the patiently put-upon overseer.

THE EVE OF ST. MARK (20th Century-Fox) Maxwell Anderson's play, turned into 96 minutes of waiting for something to happen. William Eythe being the nice young Private Quizz West, in love with Janet Feller (Anne Baxter), the neighbor girl he leaves behind when he goes off to war. His furlough visits back to the farm, and tender welcoming by his family—his mother, Ruth Nelson, his father, Ray Collins, and his kid brothers, Dicky Moore and Jimmy Clark.

But it's all so "too typical." Life in the army, the other fellahs in the outfit. Mike O'Shea does and says all the things you'd expect of an Irish soldier from Brooklyn, Vincent Price quotes poetry and sage comments, as the observing, rather cynical intellectual.

But whatever's the motive — a cross section; a simple selecting of a few people to show what war is, how it's changed the lives of so many and how they react to those changes —the nearly forgotten comment of "too little, and too late" sums up the net result. There's too little in the story that we don't already know, and it's come too late to make any very vivid impression. For all that it's an artfully done thing, and has it's intensely real moments, it's not as moving as you'd hope it to be.

WATERFRONT (PRC) A story about spies, Nazis and anti-Nazis, all mixed up in the fog of San Francisco's dock districts. John Carradine gives one of his finest performances, and J. Carrol Naish, as always, is excellent.

Better than the plot itself, is the mood injected by the film, beginning with the opening scene and sustained faithfully throughout. It is sordid, menacing and packed with suspense. Full of intrigue, throat-slitting and shooting, it's guaranteed to give you a super case of spinal chills—all very enjoyable, if that's what you like.

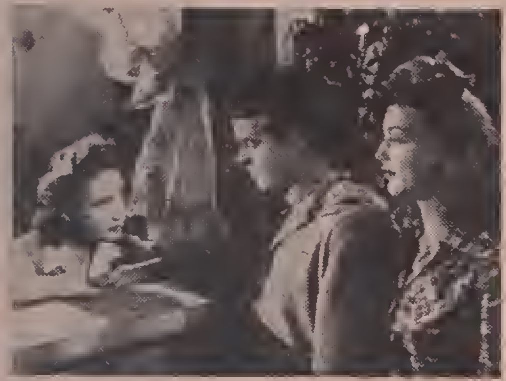
GUIDE



SONG OF THE OPEN ROAD (United Artists) A picture with the accent strictly on youth, it's a story woven around the youngsters who go from farm to ranch during the summer, harvesting crops and staying at the youth hostels.

It introduces Jane Powell, fourteen-year-old newcomer with an amazing voice, who promises to out-Durbin Deanna. Jane portrays a child movie star who, after having made a government short with a crowd of the young harvesters, decides to run away and join them. It ends with Jane's saving an orange crop, through putting on a show for volunteer pickers. And her show includes such talent as Edgar Bergen and Charlie, W. C. Fields, and Sammy Kaye's orchestra.

The whole story is unfeasible and weak, but there is some good entertainment, with Jane's songs enough to make the whole thing worthwhile.

ADDRESS UNKNOWN (Columbia) An extremely faithful film version of the Kressman Taylor story, which caused such a sensation about two years ago.

Aryan Paul Lukas, in Berlin on business, becomes innoculated with the Nazi creed, breaks off relationship with his partner back in America, who is a Jew. When Lukas refuses to aid his partner's daughter, an actress in Germany, the Nazis execute her. His partner brings about revenge in a subtle and terrifying way.

The musical background is much too loud, and the photography gives the impression of trying too hard to be effective, but the performances of the cast make up for these defects. The film introduces K. T. Stevens, who portrays the daughter exceptionally well. Lukas is excellent, as always.

The picture seems to come a year too late, adding nothing to our knowledge of Nazism. But maybe you won't think so.

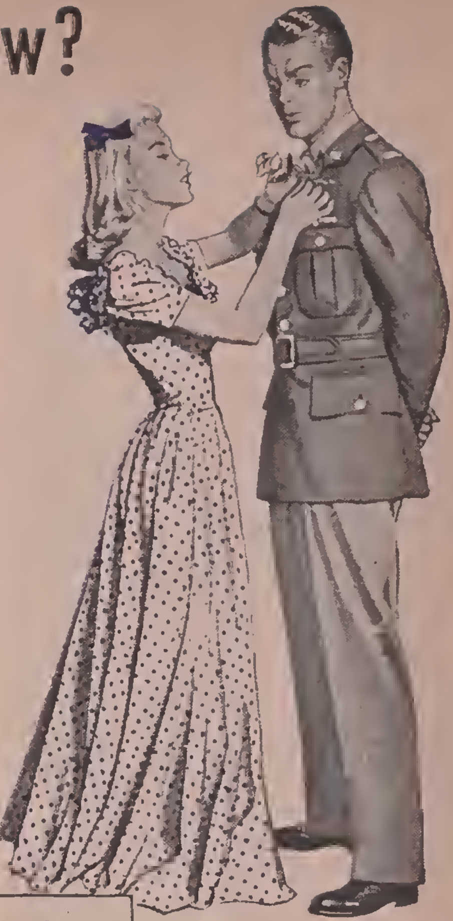
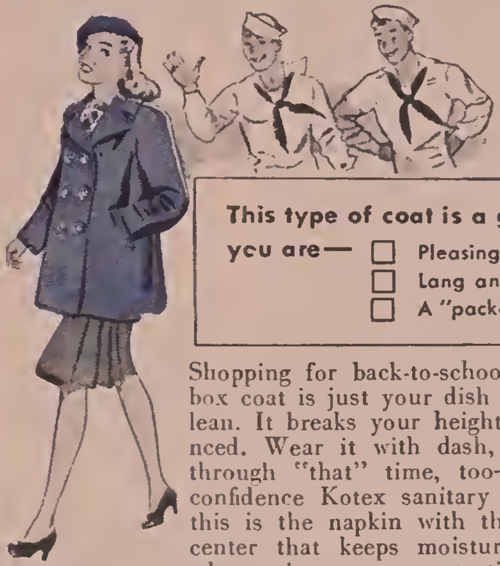
Are You in the Know?

What's wrong with this picture?
☐ The rose is on the wrong lapel
☐ The Lieutenant is allergic to roses
☐ He's forbidden to wear non-military ornaments

Your rose may be as precious to him as a campaign ribbon. But—only military ornaments are permitted on an officer's uniform. Be sure about military etiquette! And to be sure of yourself, on "trying days" choose the napkin that doesn't show even under your filmiest formal. With Kotex, you needn't fear telltale outlines, for the ends of Kotex are pressed flat—different from other napkins because they're not thick, not stubby. Thanks to this patented Kotex feature you'll pass inspection always!





This type of coat is a good bet if you are—☐ Pleasingly plump
☐ Long and lean
☐ A "pocket edition"

Shopping for back-to-school togs? The short box coat is just your dish if you're long and lean. It breaks your height, adds "heft" you need. Wear it with dash, any time. Breeze through "that" time, too—with the special confidence Kotex sanitary napkins give. For this is the napkin with the patented safety-center that keeps moisture away from the edges, gives extra protection exactly where you need it most. And with Kotex, there's no wrong side to cause accidents . . . no chance to make a mistake!

Would you say she was—☐ Planning an elopement
☐ Practising fire drill
☐ Slimming the fatted calf

Climb up the ladder to bareleg beauty! Daily sprints up stairs or ladder will trim chubby calves. And try this: Lie on your right side, raise left leg high, touching ankle with left hand. Then reverse. Mild exercise is good for you on "problem days." And you'll find Kotex different from ordinary napkins . . . far more comfortable. For rather than just "feel" soft, at first touch—Kotex stays soft while wearing. Unlike flimsy pads that bunch and rope, Kotex is built to hold its shape—to give you longer-lasting comfort.

IT MAKES Scents IN SUMMER

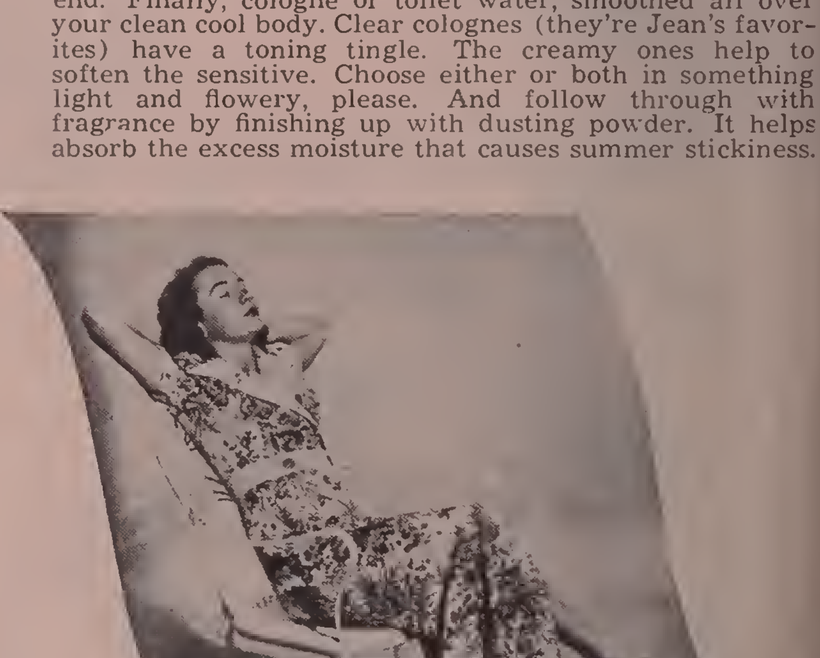
BY SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

to bathe for beauty: to rest and revive in the refreshing depths of a tepid tub. If you do as Jean Sullivan, Warner Bros. starlet does, you'll toss in a handful of scented salts for that sweet-smelling sensation. Maybe a bit of beneficial bath oil would be your choice. Or perhaps you'd rather be a bubble-bather and do your lolling in a froth of foam. Whatever the preference, the point is this. Twenty peaceful minutes in perfumed water, followed by a lavish lathering, will leave you feeling fresh and feminine, even at the end of a hot, hard day.

to acquire a second, scented skin. The bath is the beginning. A reliable deodorant or antiperspirant the second step that preserves your daintiness for hours on end. Finally, cologne or toilet water, smoothed all over your clean cool body. Clear colognes (they're Jean's favorites) have a toning tingle. The creamy ones help to soften the sensitive. Choose either or both in something light and flowery, please. And follow through with fragrance by finishing up with dusting powder. It helps absorb the excess moisture that causes summer stickiness.

to face the heat with a smile. It's a "pretty" easy habit, Jean Sullivan tells us, if you make the most of make-up and supplement it with skin freshener. Jean likes to pat her face lightly with a cotton pad that's been saturated in freshener before she applies her basic cake make-up. She always uses powder, whatever the base beneath, to add a film of flattery and make for a sheenless surface. To keep it clinging, she takes another cotton pad, moistened with ice water, and presses it gently over her finished face. This is the way to stave off shine!



to relax for restoration, whenever you can. Especially after the cooling comfort of your luxurious cleansing. So, if it's "too hot to sleep," lie back in a chair, shut your eyes, and let the drifting waves of your own faint fragrance soothe and satisfy you. Half an hour of such nighttime day dreaming, and off to bed. The bed that's made for rest is made with crisp, clean sheets, scented, too, with summery sachet. Then, a drop of perfume on your pillow, and you're ready for the sweetest possible slumber—the kind of sleep that keeps a starlet starry-eyed.

COMEDY FOR COLMAN

From tweeds in "Random Harvest" to turban in "Kismet". We admit the get-up doesn't look very funny, but it is Mr. Colman's costume for a comedy role, that of Hajj, the crafty beggar-magician in the Technicolor film version of Edwin Knoblock's famous stage play.

After more than twenty years in motion pictures, Ronald Colman retains a top spot in the affections of his public, who will be charmed by his uniquely colorful role in "Kismet". Right now, he's spending anxious days at home with his lovely wife Benita Hume, awaiting the arrival of his first child.

"I, Burgess, take thee Paulette..."

BY MARCIA DAUGHTREY

Married on Sunday, back to work Monday. There was no time for a honeymoon, because busy Paulette had commitments to do three radio shows, the week following her wedding to Burgess Meredith.

When they applied for marriage license, Paulette took the pen and started to sign first. The clerk said, "No, the man's name first." And said Meredith, "Probably the last time I'll get top billing in this marriage!"

FOUR years ago, on the set of "Second Chorus," Miss Goddard was having a wonderful time rehearsing dance routines with Fred Astaire. At one side of the stage, draped comfortably in a canvas chair, was another member of the cast—reading. Once in awhile he joined in the general hijinks. When he perpetrated a wise crack, it was likely to be the best of the day; when he perfected a rib, it was likely to be the best of the week.

"That Burgess Meredith," observed Paulette, "is a deep one. I'm not sure that I get his message. How can so intellectual a guy be so witty?"

One day Paulette strolled over to find out what he was reading. Neither of them remembers the title of the book at this remote period, but it was a serious work: one of those heavy volumes with narrow side margins, fine print and no pictures. "I read that about a month ago and liked it," volunteered Paulette with complete nonchalance.

Mr. Meredith glanced up with a quiet accusation of perjury in his eyes. He asked several questions and received swiftly glib answers. His expression changed, first to belief, then to respect. Afterward he observed, "That licks me. How do you suppose that a beautiful chassis like that ever got attached to a 24-carat brain?"

And so they became, not sweethearts, but friends. It may be that they had read, somewhere, the best of all definitions of love: "A friendship caught on fire." However, it is extremely doubtful that either of them gave it much serious thought.

When they met occasionally at Hollywood parties they had a wonderful time, both in banter and in sincere conversation. Then came the war, and Burgess was among the first to go. As landed gentry, he had a problem. Some time earlier he had acquired a farm in Spring Valley, New York. Now, with his future uncertain and with the responsibility of the farm heavy on his mind, he turned to the one person in whose business ability he had the greatest confidence. "It's never amounted to anything but a deficit, this farm of mine," he explained. "But maybe you could do a favor for me and keep an eye on it, whenever you happen to be in the East."

"Sell it to me and I'll show you!" said the girl who would doubtless win the (Continued on page 84)

It's almost too good to be true! That Paulette's next picture should be titled "I Love A Soldier," and now it turns out she really does! Captain Burgess Meredith is the co-star in this romantic real story.

Love in bloom, in the garden of Paulette's Coldwater Canyon home. They've also a farm in Spring Valley, New York, which Burgess sold to Paulette, not realizing that he'd be "keeping it in the family."

COOPER

At his Hollywood headquarters, which he calls Mulholland Farm, Errol goes in for raising wallabies. (Small kangaroos, to them as don't know.) This knotty pine room is the very masculine den of Errol Flynn's home there.

Flynn, at the bar—his very own bar it is too. Decorated with a Henry Clive mural depicting a Mexican bullfight.

So many things are always happening to Errol. But heck, maybe he's just a fall guy

IS IT Fate WITH FLYNN?

ERROL FLYNN was out on location, doing a jungle scene for "Objective Burma." Loaded down with standard army equipment, and wading hip deep in a river, he looked hot and dusty and unshaven. Not at all what you'd expect of the dashing young Romeo as he's described so frequently in the news headlines.

Well, to be quite fair, maybe he isn't.

They say you can never really know a guy—know what he's really like, that is—till you pry into his past. What are the things he remembers? His most unforgettable moments—happy, dangerous, amusing or just plain human?

One experience Errol says he'll never forget dates way back to the first time he left home. He was ten at the time, living with his family in Antrim, Ireland. Deciding it was high time he saw something of the world, he ran away. He got a job at a dairy, milking cows. Meanwhile, the whole countryside was combed, looking for him. But it was two days before they found him.

"My mother was in tears when I got home," Errol says. "And all the neighbors made such a fuss over me. I was flabbergasted, that I'd been missed at all. Why all the excitement? I just couldn't understand it."

Then comes that slow teasing smile, and he adds, "Naturally, I milked the scene to the bitter end, once I realized they were so glad to have me back. Nothing terrible was going to happen to me. The sensation was definitely pleasant."

The prodigal son in the Flynn family, Errol thinks of home only as a nice place to come back to. He was born in Ireland, lived six adventurous years in New Guinea, and has managed since to "see the world."

Errol back in Hollywood with the blue fox presented to him by the soldiers at Amchitka, Alaska.

Eight years in pictures, and Errol Flynn has been cast in most every role possible. He's been loved, hated, poked in the nose. "Uncertain Glory" makes him a hero.

He's not even bored, but hunting boars is his specialty. Errol likes the excitement of the hunt and the final kill. The thrill of anything that involves a certain amount of danger, that's for this adventurous man of world.

IS IT Fate WITH FLYNN?

CONTINUED

Skipper Errol Flynn aboard his yacht, "The Sirocco," which took the sportsman on many a glorious pre-war vacation cruise.

Provisioning his boat for cruises, Errol has always stored away fresh fruit and vegetables.

The sequel to that story, though, came many years later—when, as a grown man, the prodigal son again returned to Antrim, after six years in New Guinea. That childhood memory of his being missed still vivid in his mind, he burst in on family and friends unannounced, expecting to take them all by surprise. And perhaps he did. "But they acted as though I'd only been away for the weekend," Errol says, in telling about it now. "The best I got from them was 'Well, hello—you're looking well'."

So far, you see, the Flynn boyhood fits in pretty much as what you'd expect. Ask him if he remembers any outstanding "puppy love" romances, however, and the answer is "No." It seems that, in those days, Errol had no interest in girls. He went in for hero worship, instead. And his particular hero was a man who lived at the end of his street.

He had a glass eye, which he would remove upon request. "I used to bring the kids from school, to watch him do it," Errol says, "and became something of a hero myself, basking in his reflected glory."

But to cite another experience, in which he was anything but a hero—his first Hollywood party. What's not generally known, and something rather hard to believe unless you know him, is that Errol is shy. That to him there's no worse fate in the world than to find himself surrounded by a lot of strange people.

"I hadn't been in Hollywood very long," he explains, "and I knew very few people. I didn't know a soul at the party, except the young lady who had asked me to escort her there. I found myself alone for long periods during the evening, and I was much too reticent to force my way into any of the little groups that had formed. It was torture. I wandered around, trying to look as though I were having fun. But believe me, the unhappiest wallflower had nothing on me that night!

"Finally, when I was standing alone in a corner, a waiter came by. I practically trapped him there, trying to engage him in 'old pal' conversation. But he was busy. He'd have no part of me, and escaped in no time flat. I spent the rest of the evening wishing I could escape, too!"

Errol has since learned to cover up his shyness, so that now few people ever suspect it. There was a time, however, when his manner toward strangers was mistaken for snubbing. When he had an unmerited reputation for being "high-hat."

Yet, surprisingly enough, the things that would embarrass other people don't faze Errol in the slightest.

There was the time, for instance, when he was an actor on the London stage, before coming to Hollywood.

"I was a spear carrier in 'Macbeth,'" he'll tell you, "and I came on to announce the news of defeat. I had exactly two lines to say in the whole play, but I managed to blow up. I said one line, and then stopped—completely at a loss. Finally, after thinking hard for a moment, I gave up, turned to the audience and shrugged. 'I've run out of words,' I explained. Everyone was delighted, I'd say—except the very famous actor playing Macbeth. He had me fired!"

They say you can know a man best by the company he keeps, by the books he reads—or by his dog. Some of the most pleasant memories in Errol's life have to do with his schnauzer, named Arno. (Continued on page 66)

A true sportsman who thinks ocean fishing is about the greatest fun of all, Errol has cast out many a line and lure in water off the coast of Mexico. He also likes to "hunt fish," using bow and arrow.

No etchings, but Flynn is a collector of rare paintings. Has several Van Gogh and Gaugin originals, also valuable firearms of all vintages, and miniature boats.

Her Heart Is Young and Gay

She's been everybody's kid sister. But at seventeen, Diana Lynn is ready to start sending it solid with real honest-to-goodness drama

By DORA ALBERT

REMEMBER the sophisticated, knowing brat in "The Major and the Minor"? Remember Betty Hutton's cocky younger sister in the slightly loony house of the Kockenlockers, in "Miracle of Morgan's Creek"?

Yes, the girl who's been playing the younger sister of almost everybody on the Paramount lot—she's fresh-faced, slim-curved, blue-eyed, blonde-haired (by special request of Preston Sturges) Diana Lynn.

Seventeen years old she is now, and graduated from high school all of a month ago. "Oh, but I'm trying desperately to grow up!" she'll tell you. "I've been playing fourteen-year-old girls for so long that sometimes I myself can hardly believe that I'm really seventeen."

Actually, Diana is gay and young. Being a member of the bobby sock brigade, she swoons (but not literally) at Frank Sinatra. She also swoons at Brahms, modern Russian composers, good jive played on a good piano, Charles Boyer sometimes, Helen Hayes always, chocolate cake and chocolate ice cream. "I go on ice cream binges at every excuse—when I have lost a part, when I have been given a part, because I'm blue, because I'm happy."

She loves to bake chocolate cake. At eight-thirty at night she will often get a yen to bake a cake, get to work immediately—and at midnight she'll be eating the frosting.

Because she plays fourteen-year-old kids so convincingly she is always getting letters from fourteen and fifteen-year-olds who think that she's the Beatrice Fairfax of the slick chicks.

"Dear Diana," they say, "I am afraid no boy will ever take me out. No one has even asked yet. I'm not bad looking, but the boys just pass me by. How can I become more popular?"

"I know just how they feel about it," Diana, who is today completely in the groove, confesses. "When I was fourteen years old, I felt exactly the same way. Gee, fourteen was an awful age for me. I thought no boy would ever want to take me out.

"Actually, I started having dates just after I was fifteen. Oh, I went to parties before that, of course. But I had no actual dates. I'm glad I didn't date till I was fifteen. I think that's young enough. It's not such a good idea to start any younger, because then by the time you're sixteen or seventeen, you've been everywhere and nothing gives you a thrill any more. Me, I get an enormous kick out of everything."

In spite of the man shortage in Hollywood, Diana has as many dates as she knows what to do with. Usually on Saturday nights. She doesn't have any one special boy friend, but dates different ones on different Saturday nights—with special preference to a favored two or three.

"I like a boy to be good-looking, of course, have brains, and be able to talk about something besides Woody Herman and moving pictures. Although I adore movies, and would like to go to them five times a week. I like a boy to have consideration—to show intelligence and courtesy, but not in the sense of giving in to a girl all the time, like a pup. I wouldn't like that. I'm still looking for that creature on a white horse."

There is a kind of gentleness about Diana that you don't expect from the brat you see in pictures who tells people to "go suck a lemon." Diana isn't brazen. She isn't knowing, she isn't cocky. The truth is that she's a bobby socks kid set to Brahms music. Still, she isn't a square—nor is she strictly a cat. She can play boogie woogie, but she plays classical music better. She hasn't always been on the jive.

Time was when she couldn't jitterbug. She used to go down to the Hollywood Canteen and a jitter-mad kid would take her in his arms. She would try to scream above the music, "I can't jitter!" But the bands played so loudly that the boys she danced with couldn't hear a word she was saying. They swung her madly across the room, while she wondered just which ear she was going to land on. Above the music once her jive partner shouted, "Gee, you're the cutest reed I've seen in a long time!"

As of the present, Diana can classify as an alligator from way back. She learned at Big Bear. "If you weren't able to jitterbug there, you just weren't there." And today she can cut a rug with any kitten, and swing to all the riffs and licks.

In "Out of This World," one of her forthcoming pictures, she'll play boogie woogie like mad. But she'll also play classical, longhair stuff. She's glad of that. She thinks she doesn't play boogie woogie well enough to be introduced as just a boogie woogie piano player—not after all the years she's given to practicing the long underwear stuff.

Diana, who is definitely on the upbeat over at Paramount, was born Dolly Loehr, in Los Angeles. Louis Loehr was an executive with a Los Angeles oil supply company. and Mrs. Loehr could make music on anybody's piano. She taught piano, too; and Dolly learned to play in the days when people would have thought that smoky joe was the name of a cigarette, and barrel-house jive the name of a dive. Dolly practiced five or six hours a day. Of course, she didn't groove it. Who did, way back then?

But even though it was all long underwear stuff, Dolly's playing was out of this world. Dolly herself was a shy, mousy kid who always took a back chair—except when someone shoved her in front of the piano.

"I did read a lot of books," she says. "There's no use pretending I was ever a brain child, but when I went to grade school I had hay fever and sinus, and that restricted me a lot. I'd have liked to go out with the other kids. You know you feel as if you're going to die at that age, if you can't do everything everyone else does. But when the hay fever got bad, Mother insisted on my staying in bed. Then what was there to do—but read?

All this time, though, Dolly was studying piano like mad. And it looked like a career on the concert stage for her. She was good enough so that her fame began to spread among other musicians. When she was eleven, the Los Angeles Junior Symphony was started, and she became pianist with the group. At twelve, she got the thrill of her life when Leopold Stokowski visited the kids and let them play for him.

Other child musicians began to think a lot of Dolly's playing. The juvenile violinists noticed that when Dolly accompanied them on the piano, they always rated a lot more applause. So when they had to go on musical tours, they'd often ask her to play for them.

And that's what took Dolly to Paramount! She was thirteen then. It was when the Paramount nabobs got what they hoped was the bright idea of building a picture around child musicians. A thing to be called "The Hard Boiled Canary" (title later changed to "There's Magic in Music"), which was to be all about the Interlochen, Michigan Summer Camp for juvenile musicians. The news spread, and drew all the child

She bleached her hair to play Betty Hutton's sister, and Diana Lynn is still somewhat startled when she sees herself "looking so very different."

Dreamy-eyed, Diana goes in for a bit of Chopin. And it's true that she played her way into her first picture role.

Rarest of the species, a California native! Also she's a sun-worshipper; thinks any girl looks better with a tan.

musicians for miles around. Among them was a rather sweet young girl violinist. She'd asked Dolly to accompany her on the piano, and Dolly did.

Dolly never expected to get a chance to do anything else. For though there was a spot for a violinist in the picture, there was none for a pianist. Still, when she'd finished accompanying the other girl, she was asked to play a solo. She did—and then forgot all about it.

Time passed, and the powers-that-be at Paramount decided that maybe there ought to be a spot in the picture for a pianist as good as Dolly. So they called her up and said, "Do you think you could play the Grieg Concerto?" Dolly thought that with a little practice she could.

"But that's too difficult a piece for a child," protested Mrs. Loehr. "Dolly, don't you think you'd better get out of it? That's a piece for grown-ups."

But Dolly went to work. And within a week, she knew the Grieg Concerto by heart.

Eventually "There's Magic in Music" was released upon what Paramount hoped would be a waiting world. Unfortunately, the picture wasn't what the world was waiting for. It was a flop.

But as a public-winning attempt, the studio sent little Dolly out on a cross-country tour. Dolly and Susanna Foster—they went together.

When they got back to Paramount, the girls found that the bad news had preceded them—their picture hadn't clicked. Previously everyone had been making a fuss over the two girls. But Hollywood is one place in the world where it's awful not to be B. O. (Box Office).

The crooner craze was the thing, and Dick had ridden in on the crest of the wave—with a little help from the juke boxes. The bigwigs figured he'd be a good bet for a couple of songs in their musical, "Four Jills and a Jeep." They didn't count on his being an actor, however—at least not such a good actor that they would be starring him in his second picture.

IT WASN'T until Betty Grable arrived at the hospital for the advent of her daughter that it occurred to her to worry about the infant's future.

What did our number one Pin-Up-Girl know about bringing up a baby? Practically nothing! She spent her recumbent ten days devouring books on child psychology. The more she read, the more it seemed that authorities differed, and the more puzzled Betty became. She learned about diet and infant regimen, but she still has no theories about rearing children.

"Except," she emphasizes carefully, "I'll never make her take singing or dancing lessons, unless she asks for them. I had enough of that sort of thing when I was a kid. My daughter won't be dragged from one dancing school to another, forced to give up her playtime to rehearsals and amateur shows. She'll not be a prodigy if I can help it!"

The present crop of babies is the biggest in a quarter of a century, so there are thousands of young parents now soberly considering the problems of Junior's guidance. Hollywood's fathers and mothers are no exceptions.

The New VAN JOHNSON

Boyish as ever, but there's been a change. Something you can't quite put into words, but there's a reason for it

By ALICE L. TILDESLEY

"BETWEEN the twelve of us," as Van Johnson likes to say, Van seems the same ebullient boy who arrived in Hollywood three years ago. He's changed outwardly less than any man who ever made a smash hit in the film city.

If he knew you then, he knows you now. He hasn't affected an accent, become a glamour boy, or gone Hollywood. He's almost appallingly modest for being one of the hottest young names in pictures. Except for the faint and ragged scar on his forehead, easily covered with make-up, he looks the same: sturdy six-foot-two, topped with tousled hair that's fair in the shade and red in the sun, bright blue eyes that regard you with shining interest, a dynamo of energy and enthusiasm.

But he's not quite the same.

"He's matured since his accident of a year ago," observes Director Mervyn LeRoy. "Naturally he knows his business better and is a finer actor, but he has acquired assurance without losing any of his boyish verve. There's nothing selfish or mean about Van. There never was. But now he's thoughtful and considerate, too."

Everyone remembers the tragic accident that struck Van down a year ago, just as

DONNA REED didn't choose the movies; the movies chose her.

She's done eleven pictures in her two years at MGM; "Dorian Gray" is her twelfth. She's a star-in-the-making, but what do you really know about her?

She's an Iowa farm girl who knows how to milk a cow and bake a fine batch of bread. She's not superstitious about anything — but, whenever she wants something very good to happen to her, she wears a Bundles-for-Britain pin given her by her agent and says it's "for luck."

She likes people and the world in general—with the exception of long telephone conversations, chain-smokers, nightclubs, table-hoppers, glitter, insincerity, bridge and four-flush.

Born and brought up on a farm in the Iowa cornbelt, near Denison, Donna's real name is Mullenger. And she's the wife of William Tuttle, assistant to the head of Metro's makeup department.

From farm to fame, with her feet still firmly on the ground, Remember Donna Reed as Private Hargrove's best girl? Her next is "Dorian Gray."

They live in an apartment in Westwood, a suburb of Los Angeles, and as Mrs. Tuttle, Donna does the cooking. Not because she likes it, but because they don't enjoy eating out, and their apartment is too small to accommodate keeping a maid.

Blonde and beautiful Virginia Mayo. Samuel Goldwyn discovered her a year ago at Billy Rose's "Diamond Horseshoe." Now comes her big chance—she's featured feminine lead in "Sylvester the Great."

Foye Emerson, script studying with Done Clark for their roles in "The Very Thought of You." (Warner's.) Believe it or not Done wos wearing uniform when his IA notice arrived.

Virginio Potton ond Bob Hutton examine a doily shooting schedule, on "Jonie" set. It's Bob's first important role. He has lood opposite Joyce Reynolds. Remember him in Destination Tokyo?

One sock very much under discussion, and three Warner "Doughgirls" relaxing between scenes. Jane Wyman, Alexis Smith, Annie Sheridan—you know which!

SOME call it "the luck of the Irish." That Jimmy Dunn should be getting the coveted role of Johnny Nolan in the 20th Century-Fox "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." Remember? He zoomed quickly to stardom on the wings of a lucky break—playing opposite Sally Eilers in "Bad Girl." And now, after years of being practically off the screen, he's done it again!

They met on the set of a thing called "Steel Against the Sky" (which was hardly a good thing, speaking critically of the picture). Now Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens are together again, in "The Doughgirls." (Craig's first picture, since his release from the Air Corps.) And what's more, they're romancing—on the screen, as in real-life.

"You'll be all right," they told Bob Hutton at Warner's, "if you never learn to act!" And that, believe it or not, was the condition on which he was given a contract.

Faye Emerson, in Hollywood three years since she was discovered in the San Diego Little Theater, and doing little or nothing, may very well credit her sudden good breaks to an accident. Feeling depressed one day, she took Ann Sheridan's advice and had her hair bleached. It was defying a studio rule, which says "don't bleach without permission." But it's taken her off the inactive list—but definitely!

From "Early To Bed" on New York stage to "Cinderella Jones" on screen. That's Angela Green's story. The sleep-before-midnight title indications are simply a funny coincidence.

Yes, it's a face. It may not be the kind of face that launched a thousand ships, and burnt the topless towers of Ilium—but it's the face of an actor who's a big name in Hollywood right now.

Writers are revising their pet plots with William Bendix in mind. Producers are looking with gimlet eyes for a story suitable for the very solid talents of this simple, tough guy, who, in three years in Hollywood, quietly and unobtrusively rose from a part so small that nobody remembers it, to a spot in the Hollywood hierarchy where his weekly salary exceeds even that of the king of the soft-hearted tough guys, Humphrey Bogart. The experts are even talking about his getting the Academy Award for his work in "The Hairy Ape," when that picture is released.

Marilyn Maxwell

1944 BRINGS Marilyn Maxwell, born under the sign Leo, the opportunity to solidify her growing popularity and prove beyond doubt that she has a right to a permanent place among the stars.

Jupiter and Saturn, planets which give and yet restrict, placed side by side at her birth and in difficult relationship to her natal Venus, brought their share of trouble, which she can now count as definitely in the past.

She will now have more freedom than has ever been hers before.

It may be a bit heady at first, especially since some personal duty will also be lightened, but her great sense of dignity will protect her from the usual errors. She has a keenly sensitive and affectionate nature which demands certain approval. Her planets give her discrimination to daring, endless patience, and a wisdom in avoiding the pitfalls of vanity and insincerity.

As much time as possible should be spent out of doors, and rest is essential. For though her energies seem boundless, there is a nervous tension at times, due to her capacity for driving herself. Riding is a sport she should enjoy, though it is suggested her mounts be chosen for dependable dispositions rather than for spirited action or high breeding.

Since her Venus relationship to Mercury adds great charm and an apparently superficial fondness for amusement, few understand the intelligence and fundamental honesty which place her beyond the reach of any who might try to take advantage of her. No one may come between her and her ambitions, which are high.

1944 is kind to her, and, through a difficult role inherited at a moment's notice, the end of the year may find her established as its most outstanding discovery among the younger stars. Hers tends to be a long and steadily mounting career—if she so wills it; and she will honestly earn every success which comes her way.

For persons born between July 23 and August 23

This is a bright year for Leo—especially after spring has cleared up the confusion and difficulties. If you have discovered that patience is necessary, and you have learned to be quiet and let things take their natural courses, the year is bright for you.

Yes, this is a year of great opportunities. While they begin to appear as rewards earned, don't for a minute stop being on the alert for ways of improving your talents. Don't be shy about letting it be known that you have talents, and, above all, scrap all fear, and follow your chances, no matter where they seem to lead you.

Much that has been almost too hard to bear will be released, but don't let the sudden independence make you shortsighted. Expand channels of education, for learning will be much easier than ever before since you are now keenly responsive. Family matters are emphasized, either by a closer drawing together, or by a complete separation, which may be brought about by travel. Very helpful offers come to you, and friendships expand to include interesting people. You may benefit through the legal loss of another.

Partners will work with you and share their gains, and their advice is in general good. Your own generosity and understanding will set you very solidly on the road to future security. Whatever your career, or whatever new career you choose, you should aim at its greatest heights this year. Achievement is in your grasp and success, if you do not overlook your own shortcomings, yours to take and hold.

OH, for the life of a Hollywood cameraman! Snooping for the glamour, spotting the celebs. Where the stars go, he goes — and his "night out" is every night. Every time the stars appear—at the premieres, at movieland parties, from night clubs to the show "openings." He covers everything that happens in Hollywood. Is there when it happens, and takes the picture. And the pictures tell the story—and here you have it. Click that shutter, flash that bulb—that's "shooting the stars."

SONNY TUFTS

The Tufts don't go much for family portraits, so this 1934 snapshot is doubtless one of the few pictures you'll ever see of Sonny Tufts with his mother and Dad.

At home with the family at Indian Ridge (near Boston), and with his two dogs. Sonny's next ambition is to start an aviary and raise a lot of rare tropical birds.

There's never been another guy like him in Hollywood. Discovered by the public in "So Proudly We Hail" Movieland fans may know him better as "Kansas."

Sonny, all six-foot-four of him, when he was a life guard one summer, between school terms. He's a tireless swimmer and very often stays beyond the breakers for hours, spearing fish.

SO YOU'RE IN LOVE

"LET'S FACE IT," said Phyllis Brooks. "Almost every man of marriageable age is in the army. Our male population has moved out since the war started. Statisticians predict that after the war, fifteen percent of the girls now eighteen years old will have no chance to get married."

Phyllis, with Una Merkle and Gary Cooper, had just returned from a thirteen weeks entertainment tour of the army bases in Australia and New Guinea.

"Most of our service men in Australia have been there for from two to three years. Long enough, in many instances, for the girls they left behind to have become vague memories. Why, some of these young

"When our boys arrived, Australia was practically manless, you know. They had been pouring men onto the European battle front since the war started. And constantly in fear of Jap invasion, the Aussie women looked upon the arrival of our soldiers as the coming of saviors.

"Nothing was too good for the Yank. 'Good on you Yank,' they all say—it's the equivalent of our 'Hiyah boys, good to see you.' And after the Aussies' first glimpse of our boys, the American gals were up against some keen competition, let me tell you.

"We American girls never pamper and baby our men; these Aussie women do. They shower them with praise and hero worship. What's more, the gals aren't lacking in eye-appeal; many of them are startlingly beautiful. Tall and slim, with coloring much like ours. Oh yes, let's not kid ourselves. There have been many marriages and engagements between our boys and the Aussies.

"I don't mean that every soldier falls for these gals. With the man who knows that the only girl in the world is waiting back home, it's different. Once they get back, there is likely to be a change of heart—at least for some.

the Wonderful, Wacky life of ROBERT WALKER

Robert Walker, six feet. tall, weight 145 pounds, brown-haired, blue-eyed, named by MGM as their ace screen discovery of 1943.

Some expert advice from ace director Mervyn LeRoy who outlines an important scene in "Madame Curie."

WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE:

Bob Walker grew up in Salt Lake City, a gangling kid with an urge to run away from home. He satisfied this urge so often that an aunt in New York financed his being sent away to a military school. There he was encouraged to act, appearing in several school plays. His aunt, delighted that Bob had finally found an anchor in life, brought him to New York to see him through the Academy of Dramatic Arts. The first day there, Bob met Phylis Isley, the future Jennifer Jones—and also the future Mrs. Robert Walker. The story continues:

Part Two

IT was September, 1938. Robert Walker and Phylis Isley were enrolled in the same class at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. That first day each member of the class read lines. Afterward, Phylis approached Bob Walker to say that she thought he had done an excellent job. "I thought you were swell too," Bob said quickly.

That's how it started. They read hundreds of plays together; they worked out thousands of scenes. Together all day in classes, they often went on until late in the evening. One night Bob put down his script and looked at the girl who was eventually to become Jennifer Jones in Hollywood. "Do you realize that we've never had a real date?" he demanded. "I mean a terrific evening of dinner and dancing and that sort of thing?"

Jennifer smiled at him. And when she smiles, apple blossoms sprout from broomsticks. "I think just reading a play with you is a terrific date," she said.

"Tell you what. When either of us gets a big break, we'll really cover New York. We'll celebrate," Bob said. Then he told her about his chance to read for Hammerstein. "Maybe this is it. Maybe tomorrow at this time we'll be out getting acquainted with the better head waiters."

He read for the part. It was a comedy role and the view was held by the producer (Continued on page 71)

Liking the sunshine, Bob settles himself outside his dressing room, between scenes, and studies his script.

Bob and Jennifer had always wanted to do a picture together. They're sweethearts in "Since You Went Away." Here they're shown with Shirley Temple, Ingrid Bergman, Joe Cotton and David Selznick at Selznick party.

Walker arrives on set, ready for his first day's work in "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo." Next he's scheduled to go into "The Clock," playing the lead role opposite Judy Garland.

Harry James and Ethel Smith, wizard of the electric organ, as they appear in M-G-M's musical, "Bathing Beauty."

A homemade hotfoot, all in fun, as Frank Sinatra relaxes with his arranger-conductor, Axel Stordahl.

Words of Music

BY JILL WARREN

GREETINGS, girls and boys. Here I am, back, in Ye Olde Hollywoode after a whirl in New York. The big city was lots of fun, but I must admit that Sunset and Vine looked pretty good. I've been the busy character picking up little tid-bits for you, so if you have nothing to do for the next few minutes, and your reading glasses are handy, you might waltz through the assembled stuff.

THE TUNEFILMS:

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer is getting better and better with their musicals. Their newest release, "Two Girls And A Sailor," has enough talent for a couple of pictures. The two girls are June Allyson and Gloria De Haven, and the sailor is Van Johnson. There's lots of good music, too. And why not? With such melody dispensers as Jose Iturbi, Lena Horne, the Xavier Cugat band and vocalists, Virginia O'Brien, Harry James and his orchestra and Helen Forrest and Buddy Moreno. Lena Horne sings "Paper Doll," Jimmy Durante sings "Inka Dinka Doo"—and all the way through for the first time—and Iturbi and his sister, Ampara, do a double piano number. But that isn't all. Harry James and June Allyson are featured with the James band in a big number, "Young Man With A Horn." And Helen Forrest and Buddy Moreno each sing a song. Incidentally, Buddy is now stationed down in Alabama, and is assigned to the Special Service division of the Army.

Jimmy and Tommy Dorsey are both working on the Metro lot—Jimmy in the Abbott-Costello picture, "Lost In A Harem," and Tommy in "Thrill Of A Romance."

Perry Como is going to sing two ditties in his first picture, Twentieth Century-Fox' "Something For The Boys." The songs were specially written for him by Jimmy McHugh and Harold Adamson, who wrote Sinatra's tunes for "Higher and Higher" and Dick Haymes' numbers for "Four Jills And A Jeep." The composers now laughingly (Continued on page 73)

Jill Warren gets exclusive musical tips from musical people. Left to right, David Street, Ella Mae Morse, Jill, Harriet Hillard, Ozzie Nelson, Maestro Billy Mills.

It's his turn now! Dennis Day, in his new Ensign's uniform, puts ex-boss Jack Benny to work on the business end of a busy mop.

COUNTRY CARNIVAL

Annie Rutherford and Patsy Ruth Miller give out with prizes, including the inevitable cupie doll.

Virginia Grey chats with Lum and Abner, who were in their element, what with the homespun atmosphere.

Dolly Jarvis, Kim Hunter and Francis Lederer chawin' the fat and sure shootin' all dressed up fit to kill.

Mischa Auer, as barker with handlebars, tells of wondrous prizes to be won. Mrs. Auer plays Girl Friday.

Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz with Movieland's own Bill Dudas, the cowboy.

Van Johnson with Mrs. Keenan Wynn, in city slicker clothes, holding "Oscars" the lucky pair won tumbling milk bottles.

By cracky, it's Hollywood going rustic! Not exactly Hollywood, that is, but the stars showed up at a barn out Encino way, where the glitter and glamour of movieland have their ranches. There were games and fiddle music, booths and refreshments—all good old-fashioned corn—and the benefits went to the Birmingham General Hospital, filled with war wounded

Your Problem and Mine

BY Bonita Granville

The way we look at it, the younger generation has just as many problems as the oldsters. We think they're even more important—because when you're in your teens or twenties, you haven't much past experience to guide you in your trouble. If you are young and have a problem, write to Bonita Granville, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, California

Dear Bonita:

I am not yet fifteen and very tall for my age. I am five feet nine and a half inches tall, and very self-conscious about it, especially since all my friends are shorter and it makes me feel out of place.

Since you are a Hollywood star, I thought you might be able to give me some suggestions about overcoming this complex.

I will appreciate your advice and promise to follow it.

Thank you very much,
Carrie L.

Dear Carrie:

I am very happy to try and help you with your problem. I think the main thing to remember is your posture. Don't try to hide your height by stooped shoulders or poor carriage. You will only accent it all the more and present a careless appearance.

Do what such famous tall Hollywood girls as Bunny Waters and Helen O'Hara do: Stand up to your full height, walk proudly and correctly, forget your height, and others will do the same. These girls even wear high heels, and dress as normally as their friends of medium height. In short, think of yourself as normal, and then dress and act that way. They've succeeded, and there is no reason why you shouldn't.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am very unhappy and wish that you could help me.

You see, I am quite a pretty girl but weigh at least fifty pounds more than I should.

All my life I have suffered from being overweight, being so lonesome and never being invited to parties. Even if I were, I feel so ashamed of myself I hate to go anywhere. I've tried diets, but they seem so slow and never get me anywhere. I haven't even enough energy to get a job, and am always blue.

Please tell me something to do and give me a new lease on life.

Yours,
Alice T.

Dear Alice T.:

I have read your unhappy letter, and believe your case is both mental and physical. You must adjust yourself to the right frame of mind, and then go and consult a reputable physician.

Since you speak of a lack of energy along with the excess weight, it occurs to me that yours might be a glandular problem, and one that the great advance in medical science should be able to help. But this is only provided you have implicit faith in your doctor, and follow his instructions to the letter. If he prescribes a diet, stick to it, and determine to whip this problem of yours. In that way only will you succeed.

Cordially,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am being teased terribly by my family for something I did, and I want you to tell me if I did the right thing.

Last month I read in a Hollywood magazine that motion picture stars like to receive fan mail because it helps them to know how popular they are. So I sat right down and wrote to several of my favorite stars. But when their answers came, my friends and family just ribbed and ribbed me until I felt awful about it.

Please tell me if I did the right thing by writing letters to the stars.

Yours truly,
Lucy K.

Dear Lucy:

Of course you did the right thing in writing those letters to your favorite stars. We all get a thrill out of fan mail, and need it very much. It is your way to show your appreciation for the effort we make to please you.

As to the ribbing, I speak not only for myself, but for all my friends in pictures in saying Thank You for taking the time and effort to tell us you enjoy our work.

Cordially,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am engaged to a soldier overseas. Is it alright for me to have male companions while he is away, or shouldn't I.

MOVIELAND'S Five Best Pictures of the Month

(Paramount)

The STORY of DR. WASSELL

CECIL B. DeMILLE has done it again! With his "The Story of Dr. Wassell," he has overcome all the usual objections to "war pictures"—or, if not all, at any rate he's managed to sacrifice none of the drama of a war situation, in making it primarily a story of people rather than events.

Based on the true-to-fact accomplishments of Lt. Commander (now Commander) Corydon M. Wassell, it gives you the life-story highlights of an Arkansas doctor, representatively American and convincingly so; traces his career through the years of his medical research work in China, and even manages to sketch in his one great romance.

For it's more than a story, complete within itself. It is heroism, made truly glorious and depicted with a minimum of self-consciousness. While focusing attention on individuals—men wounded in Pacific area combat, whole military units caught in the escape trap of fleeing from Burma—there's sheer drama, stark and effectively real, in any number of bombing scenes, in Dr. Wassell's refusal to abandon his charges, his desperate determination to "bring 'em out alive," and the series of desperate situations which arise to defeat and discourage his every attempt.

Gary Cooper's "Dr. Wassell" is adequate all the way through, and at times transcends being just an excellent living character interpretation. One assumes that Laraine Day, as the pretty young nurse who's in love with him, is intended to give romantic-interest relief to an emotionally stricken audience, and she does—just that.

(United Artists)

THE HAIRY APE

CERTAIN to be the most discussion provoking adaptation of a play ever to come to the screen, "The Hairy Ape" will either go down in film history as something comparable to any of the best European productions, and thereby start a new trend in Hollywood—or, it will be a remarkable failure. Between those predictions, the critic must base his judgment on three quite separate analyses.

First, does it succeed as a story? Presenting Bill Bendix as the coal-stoking sailor of more brawn than brains, and Susan Hayward as the spoiled "rich girl," it might be considered to protest against social class differences. The social-consciousness conclusions, however, aren't definitely drawn, only suggested. So the picture version of the Eugene O'Neill play serves more the purpose of the honest observer than the would-be crusader.

Second, is the photography and striving for effect really as masterful as was intended? The realist might not think so, but the artist would applaud the success with which "the obvious" is so regularly avoided.

Third, what is the final impression gained as the sum-total result? Eliminating the John Loder and Dorothy Comingore performances, as being no more than contributions, one can say it's an amazing presentation of psychological conflict. The Jules Levey variations from the original beauty and the beast theme, as O'Neill created it, make for a more happy ending. They distract nothing, and add a great deal. But it's "for adults only."

(20th Century-Fox)

HOME IN INDIANA

LON McCALLISTER, the kid who made such a hit as "California" in "Stage Door Canteen," comes back to the screen for a last picture before going into service.

"Home in Indiana" is a story of sulky racing in Indiana, in which Lon plays the role of an orphan boy—a stubborn, wayward but lovable kid who's sent to live with his aunt and uncle, played by Charlotte Greenwood and Walter Brennan.

Primarily a tale of fine horses—the breeding, training and racing of them—the plot runs somewhat "according to formula," but is really only incidental as such. You have the longstanding feud between a couple of top racing stables. How the owner of one succeeded in besting and breaking the other, so that the barns on one farm are full of blue-ribbon entries, and the competing farm is run-down and the owner (Walter Brennan) left bitter with memories of past triumphs, no hope of staging a come-back.

That's the situation and "what has gone before" when Lon arrives on the scene, and sets out to do something about it. He gets into a series of difficulties, of course, all with the determined good intentions of a kid who's "crazy about horses." He also gets himself involved in a youthful love triangle, with two pretty girls (June Haver and Jeanne Crain) from the rival farm next door.

Filmed in Technicolor, the picture is scene-beautiful for all. For those who like love stories, horses, pathos, comedy with just a touch of tears, it's completely charming.

(Paramount)

DOUBLE INDEMNITY

"IT'S murder!" Murder committed by the hero (Fred MacMurray), who's a super-smart insurance salesman, and the heroine (Barbara Stanwyck), the victim's wife.

But it's a far cry from the usual "whodunit." Laid in Los Angeles, it's the sort of yarn that could come from most any newspaper front page. Real people, saying real lines. A man who knew as well as the next guy that there's no such thing as "the perfect crime." A coldly calculating gal who knew she could make him fall in love with her, and that together they'd be "playing it smart."

So what you see is more than just a plot about killing a man to collect on his insurance policy, and planning it so that the claim would be for "double indemnity." It's the scheming of a shrew, the destruction of a man's conscience. No maudlin despair, no weakening, no regrets.

It's something that could happen to you, or to the people you know. And you're made aware of that, which doesn't necessarily make the experience a to-be-dreaded one, but it sends you away with plenty to think about. Fred MacMurray gives you that man. And he tells the story, as a confession. Tells every step in the development of the plot, just as it happened. Rather, as it accumulated, till he was trapped beyond escape.

Settings, timing, photography and incidental music on the sound track—everything contrives to make it more intense than the Dostoevsky "Crime and Punishment," more revolutionary than anything Hollywood has ever turned out.

(M-G-M)

TWO GIRLS AND A SAILOR

A REALLY socko musical—and the first one in a long time that has a plausible and entertaining plot running throughout. The title is a give-away; it really is about two girls and a sailor. Two sisters, in fact, played by June Allyson and Gloria De Haven.

They grow up in show business and become a successful song and dance team in the swankier night clubs. Their ambition is to have a canteen for the servicemen, and that's where the sailor comes in—enter Van Johnson. The girls don't know that Van is the happy possessor of several million dollars, which accounts for their surprise and bewilderment when their canteen is bestowed on them, anonymously.

The night clubs and the canteen give opportunity for plenty of talented entertainment, and Metro has certainly taken advantage of it. Gracie Allen plays her "Concerto for Index Finger"; Jose Iturbi plays the "Ritual Fire Dance"; Jimmy Durante scored a big hit by singing "Inka Dinka Doo" (all the way through); Helen Forrest sings "In a Moment of Madness"; Virginia O'Brien gives out with her dead pan rendition of "Take It Easy"; Lena Horne sings "Paper Doll"—and there are Harry James and Xavier Cugat with their bands, plus Helen Forrest and Lina Romay.

Gloria de Haven and June Allyson loom as definite star material, and June's rendition of "Young Man With a Horn," featuring Harry James, is one of the best numbers in the show.

Sub-sixteen

Peggy Ann Garner as Movieland readers saw her in "Jane Eyre." In real life Peggy is gay and carefree and witty.

And doing very nicely thanks!

The name is Peggy—

Presenting Miss Peggy Ann Garner

To Peggy goes the coveted role of Francie in 20th Century-Fox's production of "A Tree Grows In Brooklyn"—perhaps the biggest and best role offered a child in 1944—so far, at least.

SHE'S twelve years old, has a prodigious appetite and a definite sense of humor.

You have seen her in many films, more recently "The Pied Piper" and "Jane Eyre." If you're the sentimental type, you were spilling tears over her portrayal of young Jane Eyre as the unwanted waif.

But Peggy Ann doesn't give the impression of being a dramatic actress, when you meet her. She's gay and carefree, and much like any other twelve-year-old girl —except for an exceptional wit, and a very mature grasp of what it's all about. (The picture industry, we mean.)

We talked to her just after she had been told she will have the part of "Francie" in the 20th Century-Fox production of "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." It's perhaps the biggest role offered a child in 1944—so far, at least. But Peggy isn't showing any great excitement. Taking it all as a matter of course, is she? But we suspect that deep down inside she's in a turmoil of happiness.

Peggy Ann was born in Canton, Ohio, and since then has made eight trips across the country. She first played in summer stock, at the age of five, and has been acting ever since. Oh, and encouraged by her parents. She lives with her mother, near the studio. Her father, who came to this country from England when a young boy, is now in service as a lieutenant in the United States Army. Miss Garner is immensely proud of her dad; carries his picture in a locket around her neck, displaying it enthusiastically to anyone who shows even the slightest interest.

"I have only one boy friend," states Miss G. "My father."

But she has another love, besides acting. Five months ago she donned ice skates for the first time, and now executes figure eights and serpentines with the greatest of ease.

She dotes on: her dog, Wagsie, who's a combination of breeds unheard of; Joan Fontaine's acting ability; lamb chops (three or four); crazy hats "on other women"; marshmallow sundaes; and spelling. She plays a game with her mother, sort of a two-woman spelling bee, and informs us her mother owes her sixty cents to date.

She cannot tolerate cabbage, brussels sprouts or liver. Snails and alarm clocks also come under this category.

Peggy Ann declares she isn't afraid of anything, not even the role of Francie. That sounds like a strong minded young woman, but we add it up to courage and confidence. With her dramatic intensity, and ability to tug at your sentiments, we know she'll do a great job.

Their Names will be forever Secret—

You'll never meet them face to face. You'll never shake their hands. Their names, their homes, their families are closely guarded secrets.

But these 10,086 women went out of their way to tell you one special secret. Honestly and frankly they wrote why they switched to Modess.

And 8 out of 10 said "So soft!" "So safe!" or "So heavenly comfortable!"

They'd all been users of most every type of napkin. Yet they rated Modess tops! So try Modess—it costs no more! Just read what women say . . .

Are you helping feed the nation? Or filling the boss's shoes like Miss G. W.? She writes, "Long hours mean I have greater need for Modess' dependable protection!" And thousands of girls agree Modess is safer. Gives you full-way protection because there's a triple full-length shield at the back.

Are you up with the birds and off to the war plant like Miss L. G.? Then you'll appreciate her tip. "Modess' downy-soft filler assures carefree comfort!" she says. And no wonder—for Modess' special softspun filler is very different from close-packed, layer-type pads.

Are you a gay, young thing? Working and playing harder like Miss P. F.? She says, "Modess is tailor-made to fit my body perfectly!" So see how easily and gently Modess moulds itself to fit you. No outlines. No hard tab ends.

REHEARSAL FOR HAVING A BABY

Gregory Peck and his wife expect the stork, come some day in August. The only hospital reservation Gregory could get for his missus was August 16th. They fervently hope the baby will oblige and arrive on that date, or shortly thereafter. Gregory is so worried about it that he made a "trial run" the other night to the hospital, figuring out the shortest way to get there, and clocking himself to the very second.

WITHOUT LOVE MAYBE

Six weeks in the East, after finishing "Dragon Seed," and Katie Hepburn is back in Hollywood. Having visited her family (the first time in nearly a year), and done a few radio shows, she's waiting now to see what will be decided about "Without Love." (Her last stage play, which MGM is considering as a next picture for her.) If the screen writers can come up with a way of bringing the "Without Love" Irish situation up to date, Katie may make the movie version. And, Spencer Tracy is nominated to play opposite—if the Greer Garson bid for wanting to do a picture with him doesn't conflict.

CARY'S FUNNY THAT WAY

Cary Grant's best "happily married" testimony is the fact that he's worse than a superstitious young bride, when it comes to removing his wedding ring. No, never! If it's not to show in a picture, he covers it over with adhesive plaster, camouflages it with make-up. And he's sentimental, too, about keeping a picture of Barbara in his dressing room—but doesn't like people to comment about it. So pull-ease!

REDSKINS ON BORDER FOR MAGGIE

Assigned to make little Margaret O'Brien's between-pictures vacation in San Francisco all cozy 'n pleasant, the St. Francis Hotel publicity manager reported Margaret's arrival with her mother. "Yes, they're here," sez he frantically, over a long distance wire. "But the kid wants Indians! And where in tha - - - am I going to find Indians? It seems she's seen "Buffalo Bill." And if you ask me, it was a mistake! Next thing, I suppose, she'll want me to round up a herd of buffalo!"

BACK FROM THE FRONT

Paulette Goddard came back from her tour overseas, greatly excited and wanting to return again as soon as possible. She traveled through India, Burma and China, getting to within five miles of the Jap lines. She brushed her teeth in grapefruit juice, but says it isn't so bad once you get used to it. The Chinese, appreciating the Goddard chassis and gams, called her "Madam Cheesecake."

WRITING HIS OWN NOTICES?

When 20th Century-Fox sent the company of "Sunday Dinner for a Soldier" to Tampa on location, they couldn't find a press agent to go with them. Hollywood was scoured thoroughly, but no one could be found who was publicity-minded, and who would consent to go to Florida. In desperation, the studio asked Bill Eythe, star of the film, if he would take over the job. .So Bill not only worked at his acting from eight to six, but composed long daily wires to the studio, filled with juicy tid-bits of gossip about the cast and crew.

CUPID NEEDED A HOSTESS

Carole Landis got a call the other day from the pilot who flew her from North Africa to Gibraltar, when she was overseas entertaining the troops. He told her that his girl was coming to Hollywood, where they were to be married. He'd tried all the hotels, but hadn't been able to get accommodations. Would Carole mind playing hostess to the girl for one night?

Miss Landis not only bedded down the prospective bride, but gave her a luncheon and swimming party the following day.

Just one of the reasons why the servicemen think Carole is so swell.

FONTAINE TAKES A DATING

Joan Fontaine has lost no time in going the rounds of the night lights, since her separation from Brian Aherne. The latest escorts have been General Mike Scanlon, Harry Crocker, John Beck and Bill Bornside.

At the "Let's Ring Doorbells" broadcast, get-out-the-vote volunteers Walter Huston and Dinah Shore, and Dinah's George Montgomery.

AMONG THE UNDRAFTABLES

Turhan Bey may see military service before the war is over. But if so, it will be with the Turkish army. He's cavalry trained, ready and willing to serve when and if the call comes. And one gets the impression that he hopes it will. He's very much concerned about Turkey's remaining "a neutral."

GAG OF THE MONTH

Peter Lorre, the chiller actor, frequents Finlandia Baths regularly, and for fun sometimes answers the phone for the proprietor. The other day he picked up the phone and a voice said, "Is this Peter?"

"Yes, it is," said Peter softly.

"When will you pick up my cleaning? Today?"

"No, not today," answered Peter.

"Why not?" asked the voice.

"Because I don't feel like it."

"Is this Peter the Cleaner?"

"No, this is Peter the Lorre."

The woman finally hung up, non-plused with the remark, "Well—this is war!"

LOVE'S OLD SWEET SONG

That Shore-Montgomery liaison looks as if it's here to stay. Dinah and George have eyes only for each other. And to prove our point, we cite the instance of George on furlough. Take a soldier who's been dragged out of bed in the early dawn for months, and when he gets leave, what does he do—drives his wife to the studio at 7 a.m., sits and watches her while her make-up is applied, and stays on the set all day. That's George—and that's love.

THE IRONY OF IT ALL!

Errol Flynn recently donated money to sponsor a room in a local hospital. Honest, the hospital staff didn't know the identity of the beneficiary! And so it turned out that Mr. Flynn was the donor of a room—in the maternity ward.

BAD BARGAIN BY BROWN

In "National Velvet," Jackie Jenkins wears a small bottle suspended by a cord around his neck—receptacle for all sorts of the objectionable things collected by small boys.

For the sake of realism, Director Clarence Brown told Jackie he would give him a nickel for every bug collected and placed in said bottle. Jackie went to his beach home that night, and next day appeared with 180 sand fleas, safely ensconced in his bug bottle. Mr. Brown signed and handed over $9.00.

TIME OUT FOR TEA

Tea every afternoon—it's the daily ritual that makes the "Dorian Gray" set a little different from most others. And it could be that Hurd Hatfield (who has the lead in the picture) had something to do with initiating the very nice custom. He's spent "a great many years" of his young life in England, you know. Was studying over there with the famous Checkhov players, till the school was blitzed out and came to New York.

YOU KNEW THEM WHEN

For those who remember Alice Terry, it will be interesting to note that she and husband Rex Ingram, at last reported, are in Washington. Yes, all caught up in the political whirl of things. . . . And Bebe Daniels is doing great business in England with the Ethel Merman show, "Panama Hattie." Has long queues waiting to see her every performance. . . . Sylvia Sydney is in Hollywood again. Staying at the Beverly Hills hotel, making few comments on whether or not she intends to take up her picture career again, and being seen about town a lot meanwhile—at The Players, lunching at Romanoff's, etcetera. . . . Colleen Moore has had a coast-to-coast radio program since May, emanating from Chicago.

SELLS STORY AFTER 5 WEEKS OF TRAINING

"After the fifth story-writing assignment, one of my feature stories was published in the Ft. Worth Press. Then Soda Fountain Magazine accepted a feature. By the twelfth assignment I had a short story in the mail."—Cloyce Carter, 4140 Seventh St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

How Do You Know You Can't Write?

HAVE you ever tried? Have you ever attempted even the least bit of training, under competent guidance? Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on journalism—continuous writing—the training that has produced so many successful authors.

Learn to write by writing

Newspaper Institute's New York Copy Desk Method starts and keeps you writing in your own home. You receive actual assignments, just as if you were at work on a great metropolitan daily. Your writing is individually corrected and constructively criticized. Under such sympathetic guidance, you will find that (instead of vainly trying to copy someone else's writing tricks) you are rapidly creating your own distinctive, self-flavored style—undergoing an experience that develops your talent, insight, background and confidence as nothing else could.

Many potential writers become awestruck by fabulous stories about millionaire authors, and, therefore, give little thought to the $25, $50 and $100 or more that can often be earned for material that takes little time to write—stories, articles on social matters, budgets, household affairs, fashions, war activities, human interest stories—things that can easily be turned out in leisure moments.

A chance to test yourself —FREE!

Our unique Writing Aptitude Test tells whether you possess the fundamental qualities necessary to successful writing—acute observation, dramatic instinct, creative imagination, etc. You'll enjoy taking this test. The coupon will bring it free, without obligation. Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. (Founded 1925)

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

date other fellows but just sit at home?

You said it is easier to discuss problems with someone your own age, so that is why I am writing to you for advice.

Eloise S.

Dear Eloise S.:

In the first place, I believe you should have a complete understanding with your fiance on this matter. Find out what his sentiments are, and then if he doesn't object I see nothing wrong with your going out with a group of friends.

Try not to be seen with the same man too often, however, for it is not a good policy. People will talk, regardless of the circumstances, and when it eventually gets back to your fiance it will not be kind talk.

Why not occupy yourself with Red Cross work, and renew the acquaintance of former girl friends, who may be in the same plight?

Sincerely,
BG

NO LONGER A CHILD

Dear Miss Granville:

I am very unhappy, because although I am almost fourteen, my mother still treats me like a baby, and won't let me go out anyplace without her.

She says the streets are a dangerous place and so I can't ride a bike or skate, and she says I am too young to go out with my girl friends even. What does she expect me to do? I am no longer a child, and yet she treats me like one.

Please help me.

Virginia.

Dear Virginia:

I know it will sound very trite and old-fashioned for me to tell you that sometimes, and most of the time, Mother Does Know Best, but that is part of the answer to your problem.

It is very true that the streets are dangerous, and especially in big cities. I remember resenting the same advice when I wanted to skate in the streets, but I now know my mother was right in forbidding this.

Why don't you try to plan a group of your girl friends AND your mothers getting together, and perhaps making a little club out of it? You girls could skate at a rink if there is one nearby, and the mothers would enjoy watching the sport. This would be a compromise, and may be the answer.

Try it and let's see how it goes, and then write me about it. I will be anxious to know.

BG

SLIGHT ACCENT

Dear Bonita Granville:

I am in my 'teens, and have great ambition to be a dramatic actress, but have the problem of a slight accent. We have recently moved to a large city, and I wonder if you could advise me as to whether or not I should go to a dramatic school, even though they are quite expensive, I understand.

I have read that lots of Hollywood stars went to dramatic school before they came to Hollywood, and so thought that I should do so also.

Please advise me.

Sincerely yours,
Maria T.

Dear Maria:

There are all kinds of dramatic schools, and it is true that many motion picture players attended such schools.

However, I would suggest that you gain your dramatic schooling in your regular high school. Undoubtedly, there are classes or clubs in drama in your school, and these small plays and readings are an excellent method of learning dramatic work. As a matter of fact, I gained my dramatic start in the drama group of my junior high school, and that way discovered my really serious interest in this field.

Also, be sure and concentrate in your English courses for your accent trouble. If you ask the support of your English teachers, I am sure they will be glad to help you get rid of your accent.

BG

WANTS TO SERVE

Dear Bonita:

Ever since a very dear friend of mine was killed in action I have wanted to get into the service in some branch. I am sure there must be some spot for me somewhere, and of course I think the uniforms are very becoming to most girls.

What do you think I should do?

Yours truly,
Mildred R.

Dear Mildred:

I am always glad to hear someone say she would like to go into the Service, and I know there are many positions that might fit you.

First of all, however, you did not state your age, and whether or not you are still in school.

If you are in high school, you are probably too young for the WAC and WAVES and other branches of the Service, but there is still much you can do for your country. There is the Red Cross, the U.S.O., many local Defense groups, and I understand the hospitals want girls as Junior Aides, to train for real jobs as nurses. This would be something useful for your future, as well as patriotic. Also, remember that a lot of hard work goes with every attractive uniform!

BG

BUDGET

Dear Bonita:

I earn thirty dollars a week and never seem to have any money left at the end of the month. I work in an office and it is embarrassing to me to see the other girls with their pretty clothes that they buy out of their income that is no greater than mine. I pay board at home and that takes quite a bit, but I don't seem to know where the rest of my money goes. Do you know of a good budget plan that I could use to help me save money so I can buy the things I really want?

Kay H.

Dear Kay:

I am going to advise you to become a hoarder. Each week take your salary and divide it into separate piles. So much for lunch and carfare, so much for contribution at home, one pile for war bonds and savings and one pile for clothes. This is the only way you can manage. If you don't know what your money will buy, what your monetary obligations are, your money will continue to go out the window and you will continue to envy the other girls.

You must be firm with yourself about your money, if you want to save more, walk to work, or save on lunch money, but make a decided effort to save your money for what you want, and not spend too much on things you can't afford.

BILL BENDIX

letters a week, which is three-quarters of the way up to the mark set by that Hollywood veteran, Shirley Temple. He spends a lot of his time personally autographing pictures requested by his fans.

"Nobody likes to get a printed autograph," he says. "I know I wouldn't."

Bill is grateful to the public and the press for the recognition he has received. And no one, try as he might, can detect anything the least bit high hat about Bill. He has created a large reservoir of good will in every studio he has been connected with, and the typical comment on him is: "Gee, Bendix is a nice guy. He's really a sweet guy."

Fame didn't come to Bill because of a cute pair of dimples, a classic profile, or a Tarzan-like physique. It took talent, plus faith, plus hard earnest work in the theatre. You wouldn't expect a guy who looks like Bill Bendix to have become interested in the theatre, yet he can't remember the time when he wasn't planning to make acting his career.

It was an uphill fight, and there were times when living became a little less than a joy. Like the times he was a grocery clerk, a singing waiter—or even worse, neither a grocery clerk, nor a singing waiter, but a man out of a job.

But he was determined, refused to be discouraged.

Bill had been acting since he was a boy. Had danced as a chorus boy in Knights of Columbus theatricals. Then the Federal Theatre took a chance on him.

He perfected his acting technique, during his seven years on the New York stage—his last appearance before coming to Hollywood being in the Saroyan hit, "The Time of Your Life."

Bill is half Irish. He was born in New York—140th Street and Edgecombe Avenue, to be exact—thirty-eight years ago. He went to Townsend Harris High School. Perhaps that's one clue to his success. Bill Bendix may play simple-minded roles on the screen, but he is no dope. Townsend Harris students had to qualify on the basis of high scholastic achievement.

He realizes, as every actor of importance should, that he is the cynosure of all eyes and ears; that his slightest remark may be magnified out of all proportion, or misconstrued out of all semblance to actuality.

He spends most of his waking hours working, and thrives on a schedule that would kill anyone less inspired.

"I love my work," he says, sincerely. "If I couldn't act, I think I would die."

He has even become reconciled, finally, to the Hollywood regime of getting up early in the morning—a particularly hard thing for people accustomed to theatre hours to get used to. On some particularly fine California mornings, he almost enjoys it.

In addition to his picture work, which takes six full days a week, he has a radio show every Sunday—"The Life of Riley," a comedy series about a defense worker and his family. He entertains at the Hollywood Canteen every Saturday night, makes guest appearances on other programs. And during the one week off he had between pictures, he made an OWI short, without pay, and gave fourteen camp shows.

But despite this constant activity, Bill never seems nervous or preoccupied, never "too busy."

A hairdresser working on his set brought over a tablecloth she was embroidering with the autographs of various stars, and asked Bill to put his name on it. After he'd signed his john-henry, she asked "What's your favorite color?"

Bill quickly noted the colors already on the cloth—red, blue, green, yellow, orange—and supplied the missing one.

"Purple," said Bill.

"Now isn't that lucky?" the woman said, bustling off to find the purple thread.

Bill is courteous but impersonal in his dealings with leading ladies. He hardly has a chance to be anything else. He never gets the girl, or hasn't thus far, and about the nearest he gets to screen affection is a fond kiss on the cheek.

His fans don't like that at all. Writes one girl: "I don't see why you never get the girl. You've got something the pretty-pretty boys haven't—sincerity. A woman could really love a man like you." Bill is saving that one to show the script writers for next time!

That sincerity is the outstanding thing about Bendix, unless he is an even better actor than Hollywood thinks he is. In an otherwise homely mug, his soft, steady eyes reflect a definite spirit of kindliness and deep courage.

He likes to do things for people, and the younger actors who get the chance to work with him are indeed fortunate.

"Nobody did it for me," says Bill, "but I try to help. The most important thing is to give the young, inexperienced player a feeling of confidence in himself just before he plays the scene."

That Bill maintained his confidence in himself, through the trials and disappointments of his career, is another example of the kind and quantity of courage it takes for a man to succeed in this business.

When the "Time Of Your Life" company played Los Angeles, Bendix was the only one who didn't get an offer of a screen test. When Metro finally did sign him to a contract, and had nothing for him after the small part in "Woman of the Year," it was Bill who had the courage to ask to be released from his contract if they didn't have a part for him. It took plenty of nerve to take that face of his from casting office to casting office, and get nothing but brusque refusals. But that's Bill. He could take it.

At the Hal Roach studio he got what looked like a slim chance. The studio was experimenting with a four-reel streamlined comedy series. The first of these, "The Brooklyn Orchid," brought Bendix recognition from the major studios, and his triumphs in "Wake Island," "China," "Guadalcanal Diary," and finally in that great hit "Lifeboat" have followed in quick succession.

Bill, as an actor, is nothing if not professional. He can do a scene ten times, while the director and the cameraman fuss about the lights, the chalk marks on the floor, or at what exact point the girl comes in to interrupt. And each time he has that apparent spontaneity, the perfection of business, down to the number of times he blinks his eyes, or gapes in amazement.

"What's so hard about that?" asks Bill. On the stage you give the same performance hundreds, maybe thousands of times, night after night."

He subscribes to the school of acting which holds that an actor who "feels" the scene he plays just isn't using his bean—Bill says that such an actor would be all burned out after a few performances.

Bill's only departure from that theory was in "Lifeboat." Whenever the director said, "You're thirsty—your tongue is swollen—you can't stand it—you're dying of thirst—" Bill had to get up and take a drink. And we all know what a swell job Bill did in "Lifeboat."

When he hears something funny, Bill responds with a hoarse little giggle that's very endearing. He has his share of those illogical masculine ideas, which may or may not be endearing, depending on how indulgent a man's wife is. Here's one good example of this.

"Oh, don't you know ashes are good for the carpet?" he said, liberally sprinkling them over the luxurious rugs in the "Abroad With Two Yanks" set, where he was working at the time. He will agree, however, with sweet reasonableness, that he has never met a woman, including his wife, who saw eye to eye with him on this little matter concerning rugs and ashes.

He's one man who enjoys paying his enormous income taxes—makes him feel important, he says—but doesn't feel that qualifies him as an authority on how the country should be run.

"The only opinion I have is that this is the most wonderful country in the world and I don't want to see it spoiled."

He feels no such hesitancy, however, about saying that he loves California, thinks it's the most beautiful state in the union, although he hasn't seen all of it yet.

That's his one post-war plan—to fill his gas tank and see California.

IS IT FATE WITH FLYNN?

"It's a funny thing, but from the moment the two set eyes on each other, Errol claims that he knew this was "his dog" and Arno knew that this was "his man."

But Arno has a gift for getting into trouble. That, as a matter of fact, is how Errol happened to get him.

"Arno belonged to a friend of mine," Errol says. "One day when he was a pup about a year old, he came across a woman carrying a small dog in her arms. Arno didn't like the pup's looks, I guess. Anyway, he jumped him, thereby knocking down the woman as well as the offending pooch. So my friend decided Arno was too great a liability, he'd have to get rid of him. He did—and I took him."

Of all the things Arno's done, all the fun they've had together, the one thing Errol likes most to tell about is the look on Arno's face when he was the victim of one of the Flynn practical jokes. It seems that Arno had buried a bone in the backyard, and then gone on about his business. Errol replaced the bone with a rubber one, and then made sure he was around when the dog came to dig it up. "And if you think Arno didn't get the joke, you're very much mistaken!"

Errol, himself, is known to have had many narrow shaves. He seems to have a talent for them. But there's one he won't forget. It happened recently, while he was in Alaska on his trip to entertain the boys in service.

Twenty minutes before he was due to put on a show, he talked a pilot into taking him piggy-back riding in a P-38. That kind of piggy-back riding, you must understand, is quite different from the kind with papa. You sit on back of the pilot's seat, and with your arms around his neck, and hold on for dear life.

"It was great while it lasted," Errol says. "He gave me the works."

They landed just in time to start the show. But before Errol could say the first words, or crack his first gag, he found himself almost in the middle of an air raid. Had the Japs come over even two minutes sooner, he'd have been up there in the sky to greet them. All of which, according to those there at the time and reporting the incident, made Mr. Flynn more than a little upset—because he'd come down too soon!

Even more by chance though, probably, was the escape he tells of in connection with the making of "The Charge of the Light Brigade."

"I was supposed to be shot while on horseback," Errol says. "I took the fall and then lay face down in the dirt, playing dead. So I didn't see that the horse was dancing around nervously, coming dangerously close with his hoofs. As he was about to step on my head, a horseman on the sidelines realized the danger and rode to my rescue, just in time."

But Errol isn't the kind of guy to worry too much about these near brushes with death. He's a fatalist. Or as he himself puts it, "When you believe that everything that happens to you is inevitable, you can't get very sad or worried about anything. Today is beautiful, yesterday was lovely. There's no such thing as tomorrow."

Explaining why he's a fatalist, he goes back to his childhood again, and tells the story of what happened to his uncle.

"The old boy had just returned from India, having resigned his commission there after years of active service. The family talked a lot about what a miracle it was that he'd never been killed, not even wounded. They said thank goodness he was safe at last. Then, the first week after his return, he fell down a flight of stairs in our nice safe house, and injured his spine so that he was never able to walk properly again.

"That made a deep impression on me," Errol admits, "and convinced me that nothing ever happens until your time comes."

That's his philosophy, and that's what you'll remember every time you hear of his taking what seem like unnecessary chances. And you will be hearing reports like that, because Flynn's life is just one endless series of exciting adventures.

Like the time his friend Commander Bud Morton got special permission to take him along on a trial submarine run. Flynn wanted very much to go, the boys on the sub wanted him along, and so it was arranged.

They were out at sea for three days. Part of the program was to practice dodging depth charges sent down by a destroyer cruising overhead. At the end of three days, Errol was to be transferred to the destroyer and return to San Francisco.

He spent most of the time praying for stormy weather, so that they wouldn't be able to effect the transfer and he'd have to go on to Honolulu with the sub. "The weather," he says, "stayed disgustingly clear."

Fate was against him, it would seem. As a matter of fact, Errol has often declared that he's "unlucky that way."

Take, for example, that incident at the Mocambo recently, which by now has probably been quite generally reported. (Incidents involving the Flynn name usually are!)

"Those girls did me a favor," Errol says, laughing, and referring to the two girls who picked the Mocambo as the scene for staging some sort of an argument, the result of which was that Errol, an innocent bystander, connected with a raw egg. "People have been coming up to me ever since that little incident to say: 'We used to think you brought these things on yourself, but now we can see you're really the fall guy.'

"There I was, minding my own business, sipping my coffee and quietly watching the two girls go to it, and what happened? Of all the people there, I was the one who got knocked with the raw egg! I leave it up to you—and I think you'll agree with me on this particular point—I'm just a fall guy.

"You see how it is," Errol said. "Things just naturally happen to me. In the first place—and please quote me exactly—what the hell was a raw egg doing in a place like the Mocambo? "Honestly," he concluded, "I'm just The Victim of Fate. Anyway, it's a comforting notion."

VAN JOHNSON

he'd won his first big role with Spencer Tracy and Irene Dunne in "A Guy Named Joe." If ever a man needed friends, Van needed them then.

And they rallied. There was Keenan Wynn, bruised in the same accident, stubbornly demanding aid for Van when he'd been pronounced beyond it; there was Whitey Hendry, MGM's chief of police, rushing to the rescue; there was Spencer Tracy, offering his own blood; Irene Dunne joining him in pleas to hold up the picture for Van's recovery. And there was Victor Fleming, his director, standing outside the operating room as they took Van in. "No use waiting—nothing you can do," said the doctor.

"I know," said Vic, "but when a man goes through a door like that one, he likes to think there's someone pulling for him on the other side."

After the operation, during the long weeks in hospital, Van was deluged with flowers, fruit, books, letters, cards, telephone messages. No one forgot him. The Keenan Wynns took him to their home for his convalescence. The picture was held up until he was ready.

"Things like that you never forget," says Van. "I'm a man with a debt to pay."

And he's paying it; in every way possible. For one thing, he contributes confidence to younger players.

"We have so many kids in Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo," said Mr. LeRoy, "that it was like running a school of acting. And they were all crazy about Van. Why? Because he put them at ease. He doesn't do anything in particular. I think it's simply that he's natural, he helps them relax, makes them think it's easy. He's passing on what Tracy did for him."

The picture wasn't easy. The company was in Florida for months, living in barracks with the cadets, working hard. "Unusual weather" held up production at times. Once they found themselves working in fur pants, coats, hats, boots and gloves—and nearly froze, at that.

But Van never complains. Only his closest friend knew how he suffered from recurrent headaches. Obeying his doctor, he went to bed every night at nine, ate simple food, didn't drink, relaxed between scenes. But he never spared himself while working, or when he could help anyone.

During the big scenes when fleets of planes were taking off, one after another, the noise of engines and propellers was so great that even a casual visitor on the fringe of the set went home with a screaming headache. His friends could see that Van was almost desperate, but he made no complaint.

The Pensacola Casino invited the company to a party, after a particularly gruelling day. Van would like to have skipped the festivity, but it was for him the fans waited.

As the party wore on, came a lull. Actors were called on to entertain. But the film's cast had no stage tricks, so Van volunteered to do a song. He put everything he had into it. Got five or six encores, and might have been singing there yet, if friends hadn't carried him away.

It's not uncommon in Hollywood for ambitious actors to steal scenes from each other. Many a love sequence consists of an able battle to keep the back of the beloved's head to the camera. Phyllis Thaxter, new to films and playing opposite Van in "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo," had no such trouble.

"I made my screen test with Van," she told me. "I'd played Claudia for two years on the stage, and before that was with Lunt and Fontanne. But this was my first movie work and I was a little nervous. Right away, something clicked between us. I felt at ease. We gave something to each other. We always talked over our scenes. Van thought of little things for me to do. We worked them out, then went to Mr. LeRoy."

Van and Phyllis are enthusiastic about each other, but there's no romance in the offing.

Now concerning his amazing modesty. The other day, Van received an impressive piece of mail. Written on good bond paper, heavily embossed with names of officers, it was headed: JOAN CRAWFORD'S OFFICIAL FAN CLUB. The businesslike letter announced that Van was being given the opportunity of joining the club, dues fifty cents a year. He'd get a picture of Joan, autographed, plus regular bulletins detailing her doings. "Please sign application and return," it ended briskly. Van signed, enclosed fifty cents, and returned as directed. He hasn't received the first bulletin yet, but intends to read it when it arrives.

He's still a fan, elated because he saw Joan pass in a long, low, important-looking black car the other day. She wore dark glasses and a brimmed hat, but he recognized her and got a cordial "Hello." He tells about it, proudly.

Van speaks fan names as a fan speaks them. There was a squib in a Hollywood paper recently, intimating that Bette Davis was interested in Van Johnson. "Imagine—Bette Davis!" he groaned, reading the item. "I've never even met her. She's probably saying, 'Who on earth is Van Johnson?' "

Every so often when Van drives into his garage, his car's headlights fall on a note pinned to the wall.

"Dear Van Johnson: (it reads in a child's scrawl) Irma Jones (or somebody) hasn't a picture of you. Can you spare one?

Nancy."

Before he goes to bed, Van selects a photograph, signs it and slips it under his young neighbor's doorsill. "I'm flattered stiff," he confesses. "I'm a fan myself, and it's great having people want my picture. I hurry up and give it to them, before they change their minds.

"When I was in school, fan magazines were important to me. I used to cut out my favorite stars' pictures and pin them up on my walls. My father would look at them and say: 'Must you clutter up the place like this?' But I got a kick out of them. Times when things weren't going so well, I'd buy a ticket to a picture show. Maybe I'd see Tom Mix. Pretty soon I'd forget whatever bothered me. I'd be up there in the saddle with Tom, riding the range, leaping over cliffs, shooting villians, ending up with a yah-ti-ti-tah, and feeling swell.

"I'd go home thinking how grand it must be to make other people feel good that way. But I didn't expect to get a chance to do it. I knew I wanted to act, but I never thought I'd get to Hollywood. I went to New York, did a little of this and a little of that, and pounded the pavements looking for jobs in between."

Once he got nine dollars a week, room and board, for a summer circuit in the Catskills. Out of that he managed to pay off all his debts. Another time he and Lucille Page, an acrobatic dancer, developed some good routines and were about to accept an engagement when Lucille's husband, Buster West, closed with his show and decided to put an act together, using Van. This combination was broken up because of the stork's arrival.

Van was in the chorus of "Too Many Girls" when George Abbott called for understudies. Van volunteered and got the Dick Kollmar, Dezi Arnaz and Eddie Bracken roles to understudy. One day he ate something peculiar and felt so ill he decided to notify the stage manager that he wouldn't be on hand that night. Before his call got through, Van received a frantic call to go on for Dick Kollmar. Nobody ever recovered more quickly.

After that he did the Bracken role, and was the lead when the company reached Chicago. It was in "Pal Joey" that he caught the eye of MGM's talent scout. He turned down the offer because he felt he wasn't ready, but the conclusion of "Pal Joey" shifted him to the ranks of the unemployed. Things were tough and got tougher. Van went home to visit his father, had a telegram from Warner Brothers, and hopped on the train for Hollywood.

Van never "cultivates friends." That seems like angling for something, he thinks, and is definitely not for him. You'll never find out from Van that he does any more than receive favors.

"Ginger Rogers was the first star to invite me to her house," he tells eagerly. "Gosh, was I thrilled! I was awfully down that day, and she went out of her way to be nice to me."

He won't mention it, but it was Van who helped cheer Susan Peters when she took her turn in a hospital cot. I happened to be there when Van was given addresses he'd requested of Hollywood actors overseas who had complained of no news from home. Happy recipients tell me that Van never forgets that this one likes daffodils better than gardenias, or that one has a passion for blossoms in gold and blue. The Keenan Wynns got notice to vacate their home while Keenan was over in the Orient entertaining servicemen. Van, who considers himself the fourth member of the Wynn family group (which includes the baby, who's "getting huge in a small way"), put in his spare time looking for a new home for them, and cheered Evie on their mutual failure by assuring her: "After all, there's nothing to worry about. You all can move in with me. My apartment has high ceilings!"

Colleen Moore visited the "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo" set and came away thinking Van Johnson one of the nicest people she'd ever met. Believe it or not, Van remembered every one of the silent star's pictures, and could discuss certain scenes he had admired. He said nothing ungallant about being a small schoolboy when he had seen them, and Colleen, who had come on the set shyly, went off feeling and walking like a queen—another Van Johnson fan.

Between the twelve of us—who wouldn't be "mad about the boy"?

THE END

SONNY TUFTS

MY FATHER:

Was a famous Boston banker, and I knew his heart was set on my joining him at the bank; in spite of everything, he expected it.

Educated me at Philips-Exeter and at Yale. But before he sent me to Exeter he made me go two years to high school. He went to high school, so I must go; he hated snobs and thought I'd avoid being one that way.

Wanted me to go to Harvard as three generations of Tufts had done, but he gave in when I held out for Yale.

Had theories about teaching me the value of money. I had to dig dandelions and mow lawns for pocket money, as a child; I had to work my way by tramp steamer to study in Paris, although he was more than willing to pay handsome sums for my voice lessons over there.

I USED TO:

Resent having to slave for money when I knew my father had plenty; but I understand now.

Do long distance swimming; fish off the sea wall at our home outside Boston; write two columns for the Yale Daily News; sing in the glee club and have five bands at once.

I ENJOY:

Ski-ing; swimming; Fisherman's Wharf in San Francisco; listening to people who know what they are talking about; bouillabaisse; Thomas Wolfe's books, especially Look Homeward Angel.

I BELIEVE:

Man worships in his own image: I usually like those who resemble me—Thomas Wolfe was six foot six inches, too.

I GET A THRILL:

From the kids who wait for me outside the studio. A dozen or so are usually on hand to say hello. They all have autographs, so they wave or talk a little and then run home. When the papers were full of the Death March on Bataan those kids were concerned. The first night they asked me: "Did you get away from Corregidor?" (They meant in So Proudly We Hail.) I replied: "Well, there was a question about that." Then I saw they were upset at the idea, so the next night I said: "Come to think of it, boys, I did get away!" And the smallest boy said: "I thought you would—you look like Flash Gordon, and I know he'd have got away!"

I LIKE:

Flash Gordon and Joe Palooka, because I think they look something like me.

Goggle-fishing under water around Santa Monica; we go down and spear fish—I caught a sheepshead weighing fifteen to twenty pounds;

The Last Puritan by George Santayana.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Losing things. I keep most of my valuables in a strong box and never wear jewelry—I'd be sure to lose it.

Breaking up glasses playing on them at table. My wife is buying me a set of drums now in order to preserve our glassware.

I'D LIKE TO LIVE OVER:

Days I spent in Europe. During college summers I used to take my bands as orchestra on Mediterranean cruises. I made twenty-two crossings. We played in Naples, Rome, Florence. Now when I see pictures of Italian battlegrounds, I recognize bombed buildings, waterfronts, even little side streets where we used to have good times. I knew the territory around that monastery near Cassino.

Those five months I studied in Paris. It was such a free and easy life, yet I got so much done.

THE TURNING POINT OF MY LIFE:

Came when I made up my mind not to go into the bank. I could have gone in as vice-president, walked into a wonderful living, although I knew nothing of banking and can't even keep my own checking account straight. I decided to be an opera singer.

MY OPERATIC AMBITION:

Began when I heard Tito Schipa, opera star, sing an aria from Rigoletto during an Atlantic crossing. I was tired of swing, tired of knocking myself out to put over a song. I thought: "If he can sing opera, I can!"

Was the incentive for my five months' studying under Gogona in Paris. I had a small studio, did my own cooking, lived on forty-eight cents a day, concentrated on my music and learned eight roles in French operas.

Was furthered when I returned to New York and a friend got me an audition at the Metropolitan Opera House, where they sent me to study with Madame Florence Easton. I took a room in a brownstone front on 76th Street, got a piano and played my scores with one finger until I learned six French roles. They called me the Hermit because I refused to go out.

Ended when I was persuaded to sing in Elsa Maxwell's show, Who's Who. I meant to go on studying, but I never did. The Broadway stage led to m-c-ing at big hotels in New York and Florida, and thence to Hollywood.

I CAN'T STAND:

Stupidity, people who can't make up their minds, the life of the party if he's merely a show-off—I enjoy the real kind.

I LOVE:

Football, rowing crews, ski-ing and acting;

Stories of the days of the knights;

Interesting people;

Changing seasons.

I RECALL:

My father, when I smell a pipe filled with fine tobacco;

My mother, when I see a dahlia—my father named a horticultural triumph for her;

Those orchestral cruises, when I hear A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody;

My Paris studio, when I taste vegetable stew. I didn't know how to cook meat.

ONCE IN MY LIFE:

I'd like to break the world's downhill ski record.

I'M PROUDEST OF:

My brother. He's a hero, commander of a destroyer, just back from Africa with decorations. He won't wear his decorations or talk about his exploits. I think he's wonderful.

I DON'T CARE FOR:

Gambling. The only time I tried it, I lost $80 at Monte Carlo;

Symphonic music, but

I'M MAD ABOUT:

Wagner, Art Tatum, Debussy and Louis Armstrong.

THE FIRST THING I NOTICE:

About a man is the way he wears his clothes.

About a woman is her eyes—I fall for pretty eyes! Then style, figure, and so on. It's always the eyes first.

I DON'T BELIEVE:

In Luck. Back of what's called Luck is talent, hard work, tremendous effort or long experience. I get angry when people think it was luck that gave me success in my first picture. I'd been entertaining since I was six years old, when I began to sing; I'd put in long hours—years of them—studying, working; I'd had experience on the stage, in night spots, at big hotels in New York and Palm Beach.

I WON'T:

Blame it on Luck if I'm not good in my new pictures, I Love a Soldier and Bring On the Girls. So why should Luck take the bows for my first screen appearance?

I THINK:

Snobbery is stupid. So is aloofness. I'm not above liking important people, if they're not stuffy; but my friends include anyone I find interesting; I know the less important waiters, doormen, three or four hundred extra players, picture crews. Why should I bore myself sitting aloofly in my dressing room instead of joining the gang on the stage?

I'M LOOKING FORWARD TO:

Living up in Hidden Valley. My wife and I have bought a new home there—a little place with a few fruit trees, lots of chickens, and a pair of mallard ducks.

MY LIFE'S:

An open book. No one can find out anything about me that the world's not welcome to know!

ROBERT WALKER

that a very thin boy—a qualification that Bob possessed in superlative degree—would be very, very funny. This viewpoint persisted for two days, while Bob and Jennifer kept their fingers crossed and avoided black cats. Then the news filtered through: the viewpoint had changed. Now they wanted a very, very fat boy for the part. Funnier.

The celebration was postponed.

A month or so later, Jennifer had a chance to read for Hammerstein, but nothing came of that, either. So the celebration had to be re-postponed.

Then, abruptly, it was summer time. Jennifer's plans called for her to go back to Tulsa, complete her stock company and go on a Southern States straw-hat circuit. Bob had decided to see the world. This was the summer, you may recall, when it was considered adventurous to sign up on a freighter or a tanker and rough it from port to port. Bob hadn't been feeling very well; he decided that he needed to build himself up by some rugged manual labor. Then, too, there was that acquaintanceship with the world that he wanted to make. His aunt wanted him to remain in New York and go on with his theatrical training. She said so, rather flatly.

Bob said just as flatly that he needed muscles, to be supplied by freighter work, and adventure, to be supplied at cargo loading points.

His aunt said that if he persisted in his attitude she wouldn't be responsible for any more schooling. Bob said he could look out for himself, thank you very much.

Ask Bob about life on a tanker some day. Then back away quickly. The story is likely to need asbestos binding. By the end of the summer Bob had lost all interest in the salty seven-eighths of the world. All he wanted to investigate was New York in the vicinity of the Academy of Dramatic Arts, particularly if there happened to be present a returned Oklahoman with wide blue eyes.

Before he called at the Barbizon Hotel for Women, where Jennifer was living, Bob went down into the village to secure quarters for himself. He looked and he looked. He wound up in Yonkers at the Wallace Co-Operative Lodge, a frugal spot where a man living on ten bucks weekly, borrowed from his brother and duly recorded in an account to be repaid someday, could be sheltered if scarcely cradled in luxury.

The housing problem solved, Bob proceeded to the Cherry Lane Theatre—one of those very small, very arty theatres down in Greenwich Village—talked the owner into giving him a job. He was to do a little scene-shifting, a little painting, some wiring, some re-roofing, and a fat share of acting. When receipts warranted it, he was to get fifty cents per night for his pains.

Ten dollars a week and fifty cents (sometimes) a night! He was set. On his first paynight he got in touch with Jennifer. He took her to Nedick's (a spot that will be recognized by New Yorkers, or any other person who has ever frequented an open air juice-and-sandwich stand). Standing in a corner that suddenly seemed like a South Sea Island—remote, balmy, and romantic—Bob and Jennifer drank orange juice, ate hot dogs, and exchanged a breathless conversation.

"If you aren't going back to school, I'm not going either," Jennifer declared partisanly. "I'll get a job at the Cherry Lane, too."

In addition to her plushy fifty cents per day, Jennifer was getting an allowance from home. In this manner Art was advancing at a rapid rate up and down the Cherry Lane's rickety stairway, when Jennifer received a radio offer from Tulsa. The station wanted her to organize her own company. And—oh, Allah is good—to bring along her own leading

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

. . . created especially for this purpose—QUEST* POWDER—soft, soothing, safe. It's the Kotex* Deodorant, approved by the Kotex laboratories. Being unscented, it doesn't merely cover up one odor with another. Quest Powder destroys napkin odor completely. It's your sure way to avoid offending.

ILLINOIS MERCHANDISE MART

Dept. 6000-A, 500 N. Dearborn St., Chicago 10, Ill.

man. You'll be astonished to know that he was a lean and able gentleman named Robert Walker.

On the way to Tulsa, Jennifer and Bob had one of those half-shouted club car conversations. To wit:

Bob: I don't ever want to settle down, do you?

Jennifer: Goodness, no. The Gypsy life for me. You know—road shows, repertory companies, summer stock. That sort of thing.

Bob: I've always said I never wanted to own property. I can't see this thing of being harnessed to a house and a load of furniture neatly embroidered with mortgages.

Jennifer: The happiest people in the world live out of suitcases.

Bob: Gosh, we think alike about everything. You're really a wonderful girl, Phyl.

And so they were married, on January 2, 1939, and set forth boldly in the resplendent red Packard Convertible Coupe that was a wedding gift from Jennifer's parents. They were headed for Hollywood—with confidence, with four suitcases, a sheaf of (they thought) persuasive letters of introduction.

In Hollywood, it soon wasn't. Several picture people took an interest in Jennifer, but they told Bob flatly that he simply wasn't the picture type. Jennifer could have signed several minor contracts, but she wouldn't have it that way.

"I don't like this town," she confided one night. "Let's go back to New York. There, you can at least get a break in radio, Bob."

They returned to New York.

At first they took an apartment in the Village. One of those deals wherein the kitchen and dining room occur simultaneously, while the living room doubles by night as bedroom.

Bob began to get a little radio work. Then a little more. Then a lot more. They bought a seventy-five dollar Ford. One day Jennifer said thoughtfully, "We're going to have to move soon, because we can't go on living in such cramped quarters, after the baby comes. Children need space and fresh air—don't you think?"

House hunting became their avocation. There were plenty of places, at plenty of price. Weeks went by, months. The situation became critical, with the distant sound of giant wings beating the air.

Eventually they located a little house, away out on Long Island, unfurnished. They went to a second hand store and bought the unavoidable items of furniture. Loading same onto the Ford, the Walkers carted the possessions they never intended to have, out to their new home.

On the last trip, Jennifer turned to Bob unsteadily. "I think we'd better dash for the hospital," she managed to say. "That . . . that road leading up to our house isn't very smooth, is it? I think I've been joggled."

Somehow Bob managed to get a taxi. (He was afraid to trust the Ford.) Somehow they got to the hospital. Somehow he lived through the aching hours until the nurse emerged to say, "It's a boy, Mr. Walker."

When young Bobbie was a year old he was joined in the nursery by Mr. Michael Walker. "Now our family is complete," Jennifer said happily, over the downy head of her youngest.

"Now you can start your career again," said Bob. "I hear that Selznick has bought 'Gone With The Wind' and is going to star an unknown as Scarlet. Wouldn't it be wonderful?"

"Not a chance," scoffed his wife.

Eventually she did test for the role (it was an actress' epidemic that year—nearly everyone had "Scarlet" fever). Her test was a trifle too ethereal for the requirements of the part of the headstrong southerner, but her acting was so indicative of talent that Mrs. Robert Walker, nee Phylis Isley, was placed under contract by David Selznick, and was rechristened Jennifer Jones.

Mr. Walker was doing okay, himself. He was so much in demand for radio shows that his days started with hair tonic and ended with foot powder.

By the time Jennifer had tested for "Claudia," and it was decided that the role would be screened with Dorothy McGuire, who had created the original Broadway character, the Walkers were living very comfortably in a smart bungalow in an excellent suburb.

"If they finally cast me in a picture," Jennifer asked Bob one night, "and I have to go to Hollywood, what will we do? You're doing so well here."

"If you get a picture break, you must go to Hollywood. I'll store the furniture and come out as soon as possible. I can always find something to do—probably in radio."

He had scarcely taken a deep breath before Jennifer was set for "Song Of Bernadette." He put Jennifer and the two boys on a westbound train, then went with his agent to the eastern offices of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, where he was tested.

Metro had bought "See Here, Private Hargrove," and a few feet of film convinced them that, in Bob Walker, they had a side-splitting Private Hargrove. He signed on the dotted line.

He didn't write, he didn't wire, he didn't telephone. First, he stored the furniture (again), then he boarded the first available Pacific-bound train. And the Walkers were reunited—in Hollywood.

Jennifer went to work at once in "Song." Metro decided to use Bob in "Bataan," before starting him in the Hargrove role, and he responded by quietly stealing the picture.

Meanwhile, both Jennifer and Bob had been quietly trying to find a way to appear in a picture together. They had struggled together, they had built two burgeoning careers, they had two chubby children. Now they wanted to do a picture together. Samuel Goldwyn announced, one morning, that he had borrowed the Walkers to play sweethearts in "Since You Went Away."

And then, just when all of Hollywood was beaming at its favorite couple, something happened. No one knows exactly what caused the difficulty, but the trouble was so great that Jennifer announced her separation from Bob Walker. Neither would talk of the tragedy, beyond the terse phrases originally released to the newspapers.

So, this chapter of the Life Of Robert Walker must end on a minor chord. That there will be subsequent chapters, no one doubts. That they will be filled with cinematic and financial success seems to be a foregone conclusion. Whether Jennifer Jones will reappear depends on so many things that no Hollywood matrimonial soothsayer has yet dared to prophesy.

WORDS OF MUSIC

call themselves "The Tuners For The Crooners." Incidentally, when Carmen Miranda met Perry for the first time, she said, "He is so cute. I think they should call this picture 'Something For The Girls'."

Charlie Spivak, who was originally announced for the "Boys" production, has been switched to "Diamond Horseshoe," which will be Betty Grable's first film when she returns to the lot.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Things really jumped at the Capitol Studios the day Betty Hutton made her first recordings. The blonde human dynamo has done two tunes for her initial commercial platters, "His Rocking Horse Ran Away" and "It Had To Be You." "Rocking Horse" is from Betty's Paramount musical, "And The Angels Sing." Paul Weston is the man with the baton.

Jo Stafford's new release couples "It Could Happen To You," another tune from "And The Angels Sing," and "Someone To Love." Paul Weston's band again.

Andy Russell's first record for Capitol, "Besame Mucho," was such a success that he has chosen another Latin song for his second offering. It's "Amor," backed up by "The Day After Forever," with Al Sack's orchestra.

Martha Tilton is back among us, and high time. I could listen to her every day in the week. Her newest Capitol release is "I'll Walk Alone," from the picture "Follow The Boys," paired with a rhythmic novelty, "Texas Polka." The tenor saxophone solos are by Eddie Miller, who is now Private Miller of the U.S.A.

Swinging over to Victor, we find a couple of goodies by Duke Ellington. "Someone" and "My Little Brown Book," with a vocal refrain by Herb Jeffries — though for some strange reason the label does not name Jeffries. There's good solo work by Rex Stewart and Johnny Hodges. Both these sides were recorded some time ago, but have not been released before.

There's a Glenn Miller platter of "Basket Weaver," a waltz, which was recorded a long time ago, coupled with a reissue, "On A Little Street In Singapore." Ray Eberle does both vocals. Victor is also issuing a Miller Album of eight sides, six swing and two sweet, including some of Glenn's biggest hits: "Stardust," "Little Brown Jug," "Pennsylvania 6-5000," "Tuxedo Junction," "American Patrol," "In The Mood," "Volga Boatman," and "Moonlight Serenade." Incidentally, Miller has signed a seven-year contract with Twentieth Century-Fox, to start the minute the war ends.

Decca has a goodly number of releases this time. Bing Crosby, with John Scott Trotter's orchestra, sings "The Day After Forever," the hit tune from his picture "Going My Way," and "It Could Happen To You."

The Mills Brothers have a new record, their first since "Paper Doll." It's "You Always Hurt The One You Love" and "Till Then."

One Best Home Way To BUILD UP RED BLOOD
To Get More Strength If You Lack Blood Iron!

You girls who suffer from simple anemia or who lose so much during monthly periods that you are pale, feel tired, weak, "dragged out"—due to low blood-iron—try Lydia Pinkham's TABLETS at once!

Pinkham's Tablets are one of the greatest blood-iron tonics you can buy to help build up red blood to give more strength and energy—in such cases.

Just try them for 30 days—then see if you, too, don't remarkably benefit. Follow label directions. Well worth trying!

Lydia Pinkham's TABLETS

"Time Waits For No One" and "In A Moment of Madness." The latter tune is the one she sings in "Two Girls And A Sailor." Helen's record with Dick Haymes of "Long Ago and Far Away" and "Look For The Silver Lining" was a big seller.

Here's "Time Waits For No One" again, this time with Johnny Long's orchestra. The reverse side is a ditty called "Featherhead." Patti Dugan is the songstress for both tunes.

Kitty Carlisle, one of Decca's new artists, gives us "I'll Get By" and "I'll Remember April." The "April" tune is a beautiful thing which has been a long while becoming popular.

Charlie Barnet's Negro discovery, Gwen Tynes, is featured on both sides of Barnet's latest Decca disc, "My Heart Isn't In It" and "Salting Away My Sweet Dreams" (Until My Sugar Comes Home To Me).

The Hoosier Hotshots, that rooty-tooty bunch, offer two amusing novelties, "Don't Change Horses" and "She Broke My Heart In Three Places" (Seattle, Chicago and New York). The Hotshots, by the way, have been signed to do a series of eight pictures for Columbia.

JAM NOTES:

Jess Stacy, who had planned to organize a band of his own with several musicians from the folded Benny Goodman outfit, changed his mind and joined Horace Heidt . . . Mrs. Clifford Smith, Helen O'Connell to you, is expecting a baby sometime in July . . . When Jan Garber opened at the Hollywood Palladium, he was billed as the "New and Exciting Jan Garber." I must say you'd never recognize the Garber band—at least I didn't. His aggregation now jumps with the best of them. He doesn't have one old arrangement left . . . Kitty Kallen has joined Harry James. She was to have gone on the Kraft Program with Bing Crosby, but a switch in plans finds her in Helen Ward's place with "The Horn."

Yvette, the little singer with the French accent who was injured in that Clipper crash in Lisbon a year or so ago, has been staging a comeback in Hollywood. She played a successful engagement at the Clover Club, and did several air guest shots, and has been signed by Universal on one one-picture deal to appear in "See My Lawyer," the next Olson and Johnson pic . . . Artie Shaw has purchased a home in Beverly Hills. At this writing nothing definite is known about his orchestra plans. Personally, I think he will stay in California and do movies and radio, rather than undertake the headache of organizing a band. But he is an unpredictable guy, so I wouldn't be surprised if he did get an outfit together all of a sudden . . . Red Dorris, Stan Kenton's saxophonist and singer, went into the service, and Gene Howard, former Teddy Powell crooner, replaced him. Anita O'Day is also now with Kenton.

Jack Owens took over the vocal chores on the Blue Network's Breakfast Club show, when Jack Baker went into the Navy . . . Trudy Erwin, Bing Crosby's former singing partner on the Kraft Music Hall, and her husband, Murdo McKenzie, ex-NBC engineer, recently became the parents of a baby girl, which they have named Karen Lee. . . .

Decca Records have signed Virginia O'Brien, Metro's dead-pan singer, and Eileen Farrell, the popular radio soprano heard on numerous CBS programs . . . Dennis Day went into the Navy with an Ensign's commission and is now stationed at the Naval Indoctrination School in Tuscon, Arizona . . . And Harry Babbitt will probably be in the Navy by the time you read this . . . Dinah Shore still hopes to go overseas to entertain the boys. She prefers the South Pacific area . . . Frank Sinatra fell for the California climate (it's really good most of the time) and purchased Mary Astor's home in Toluca Lake. He has moved Nancy and the children out from New Jersey, but he is keeping his house in Hasbrouck Heights, too. His new home is very near the Lakeside Country Club—and knowing The Voice's passion for golf, I would say he'll be spending a lot of time here knocking that little white ball around.

That's it for this time. Thanks again for all your swell letters. You ask the musical questions and I'll answer 'em. But please, not too many inquiries at a time. And don't forget to enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope. And hey, if you have any suggestions or ideas on what you'd like to read in the column, let me know. Just write Jill Warren, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California.

HEART YOUNG AND GAY

Susanna alternately wept and raged. Dolly felt lost. She hated to ask anyone for a part; but worse than that, she hated sitting around idle. Gosh, wasn't she getting older by the minute? If things kept on that way, she might get to be a real old lady of sixteen or seventeen, and never have a decent part. Already, she was fourteen.

Maybe she could get a part as an ingenue. She put on her highest heels and almost tripped into William Meiklejohn's office. (He's supervisor of talent and casting at Paramount.)

"I was at the awful age then," says Diana. "I hated to talk to anyone. It almost killed me, but I begged Meiklejohn to put me in something." He smiled gently, said, "Don't worry about it," and kept dismissing her.

Another year went by. Then finally Bobby Mayo, the casting director, said to her one day, "Put on your youngest clothes and wear no make-up. I know of a part you can play, if you look young enough."

The part was that of the kid sister in "The Major and the Minor." On the Paramount lot, they were all very much excited about the possibilities of that picture. Charles Brackett and Billy Wilder, who were to write the script, had written "Ball of Fire" for Barbara Stanwyck, and it was a sensation. They were the men of the moment, the day, the week, the month, the year. They could have anything they wanted. One of the things they wanted was a fresh-faced kid of twelve for the role of Rita Johnson's younger sister.

By this time, Dolly was fifteen.

"They'll never take you if they know how old you are," warned Bobby Mayo. "I'll tell them you're fourteen. At least they'll look at you then. Remember, put on your youngest outfit."

"Don't you think that maybe if I told them the truth, they'd give me a chance anyway?" she said. Bobby Mayo shook his head. "For heaven's sake, youngster, didn't you ever tell a lie?"

Dolly walked limply into the sacred presence of those two masters of the box-office, Wilder and Brackett. With her marched Bobby Mayo. "How old did you say she was?" they asked. "Fourteen," said Mayo firmly.

"I thought you said thirteen," said Wilder. "Fourteen is kind of old for the part."

"Anyway," said Charles Brackett, surveying Dolly approvingly, "she certainly holds her age well."

And because she did, she got the role. When she went into "The Major and the Minor" Paramount changed Dolly's name to Diana Lynn. They said they hoped she'd become a dramatic actress some day—and Dolly was no name for a dramatic actress.

"The Major and the Minor" was gloriously box-office. Diana was so perfect for the role that the next time a kid sister part was called for in "Miracle of Morgan's Creek," Preston Sturges was sure no one would do but Diana.

When "And the Angels Sing" was cast, there was a part in it for a kid sister. Guess who got it? By this time Diana was getting a little tired of playing kid sisters.

"I play the youngest sister in a group of four girls. That hurt me terribly, but it is my first musical and I wore evening clothes with gold sequin trimming. That helped."

When Diana heard that "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" was going to be cast, her own heart almost did a flip-flop.

She told Jim Davies, the masseur on the Paramount lot, how much she wanted the part.

Jim Davies looked her over sympathetically. He noticed the fresh, appealing heart-shaped face; the slim figure, the dreamy blue eyes, the charming gamin smile. "Cornelia Otis Skinner, Emily Kimbrough and Sheridan Gibney, the producer, come to me every week for massages," he said. "I'll talk to them about you."

He was as good as his word.

Finally Sheridan Gibney surrendered. "All right tell her to come to my office tomorrow."

She came. She knew that for this part she was expected to look about twenty. "So I got all dressed up and wore my hair on top of my head to look as old as possible. But it didn't make me look nearly as old as I had hoped it would. Because when Mr. Gibney saw me, he said, "I guess you can look older than that, can't you?"

"Oh, yes, this is a young outfit."

She racked her brains trying to figure out how to look older. But she got the part.

After playing: "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay," Diana heard she was being considered for an even older role—the orchestra leader in "Out of This World." This time the wardrobe department helped her. "They gave me a blue suit of Claudette Colbert's, with a string of sables and a diamond clip. They gave me a hat out of 'Lady in the Dark'—it couldn't have come from anything else, it had ostrich feathers over one eye, and a veil. The hairdresser gave me buns with false hair. Then I went to see Sam Coslow and Buddy De Sylvia. Mr. De Sylva took one look at me and said, 'Ye gods, you look forty-five! All right, you're in!'"

So Diana Lynn is no longer chanting those "I'm either too young or too old" blues. She is a happy fugitive from kid sister roles, and loving it!

"I'm sorry I invented the pocket!"

IF I HAD KNOWN that some Americans would be using pockets to hold all the extra money they're making these days I never would have invented them.

Pockets are good places to keep hands warm.

Pockets are good places to hold keys . . . and loose change for carfare and newspapers.

But pockets are no place for any kind of money except actual expense money these days.

The place—the only place—for money above living expenses is in War Bonds.

Bonds buy bullets for soldiers.

Bonds buy security for your old age.

Bonds buy education for your kids.

Bonds buy things you'll need later—that you can't buy now.

Bonds buy peace of mind—knowing that your money is in the fight.

Reach into the pocket I invented. Take out all that extra cash. Invest it in interest-bearing War Bonds.

You'll make me very happy if you do

You'll be happy too.

THAT HAYMES BOY

ahead of him.

Most actors have some sort of formula to which they can attribute their success, some plan of action which they've followed — dramatic school training, little theatre work, summer stock, something or other. But not Dick. He didn't set out ambitiously with a big goal in mind, full of determination and drive. He just set out—period. To see the world.

And such adventure as he's packed into his twenty-seven years! Experiences, thrills—enough to make a movie plot, all by himself. All just things that have actually happened to him.

Dick started batting about the earth at a tender age. Most life stories do "start young," you will say. But that doesn't account for a childhood spread around so all over the whole geography book—New York, Paris, Switzerland, Cannes, Spain, Madeira. And it means that there's a story here, which must be started at the beginning.

Dick was born in Buenos Aires. His father was an Englishman who'd gone to Argentina, with his bride. The bride (whom we introduce now as Dick's mother) was an Irish girl, brought up in the United States. Under her maiden name of Marguerite Wilson, she'd been a musical comedy artist, singing in such New York productions as "Blossom Time" and "The Merry Widow."

Professional people usually return to Broadway, once they've been there. And so it was with Mrs. Haymes. Separating from her husband, and with young Richard in tow, she exchanged life on an Argentine cattle ranch to return to the bright lights.

But in deciding to resume her career, she thought of the concert field, as a change from musicals. And that meant going to Europe, and taking Dick with her . . . and leads up to the next chapter of our story.

"I went to school for awhile in Lausanne, Switzerland," Dick says, "and later in Paris. They really make you study over there—they don't miss a trick. Besides my regular subjects, I learned French and Spanish." (He still speaks both languages fluently.) "Sports aren't neglected, either. I was taught to skii, to play tennis, swim and sail."

Swimming, however, was his favorite sport. And one summer in Cannes, he entered the matches and won the Mediterranean championship, which he held for two years.

Mrs. Haymes, meanwhile, was touring all over Europe on her singing engagements, and during vacations and holidays, Dick traveled with her. He went skiing in the Alps, sailing off the coast of France, and saw the bull fights in Spain.

"Paris was sort of our headquarters," he tells now, "because Mother had invested in a dress shop there. But whenever she had a few months between appearances, we came back to the States. Usually to Santa Barbara. Mother's people lived there."

Losing most of her money in the 1929 crash, Mrs. Haymes decided she'd had enough of Europe and returned to this country for keeps.

Dick went to school in Tarrytown, New York. But having been so thoroughly bitten by the travel bug, his first post-graduation move was to get a job as a stoker on a ship. And off he was again.

"I loved the ocean," he says, "and couldn't seem to stay away from it long. I got into all kinds of mischief on these trips. One time I went ashore at Madeira and met a kid whose father owned a winery. He showed me all around the place, and getting interested in testing all the different wines, I forgot all about the boat—which sailed without me. Stranded there, without any money, I worked at the winery then for three weeks, and waited until the next boat came by.

"On another voyage, I decided to try to make some extra money. I could play the guitar a little bit—enough to strum out a fair accompaniment—so I used to go up to the lounge every night and sing at the tables for tips."

But did he think then of singing seriously, making a living at it? No, he was "having too much fun tearing around the world."

"Counting the times I went with Mother," Dick says, "I think I made about twenty trips across the Atlantic, on everything from a tramp freighter to the Leviathan! Mother didn't worry about my getting into any serious trouble, because I knew my way around. But I'll never forget my last visit to Spain.

"I'd gone across the Basque border from Biarritz to San Sebastian, to see the bull fights. While I was there, the Spanish revolution broke out, and I had a heck of a time getting back to France. I literally had to crawl along a wall to escape the gunfire."

Back in America again then, Dick decided to come out to Hollywood. And he all but starved to death.

"Then I had an idea of contacting bandleaders, directly. I met Harry James and sang my tunes for him. He didn't like the tunes, but he did like my voice—and hired me as vocalist for his orchestra."

That was the beginning. Dick caught on with the James band, and stayed with the outfit almost three years. He's quite sentimental, too, about his association with Harry, because it was while they were playing the Paramount Theatre in New York that he met the gal he was to marry.

Joanne Marshall, her name was then. A dancer who was appearing in a revue on the same bill. They met, and it was a case of love at first sight for both of them.

"But I didn't have any money," Dick says. "I'd drawn way ahead of my salary, and I owed a lot. Harry gave me five hundred dollars on loan, to pay for my wedding—and was also my best man."

Dick left Harry a few months later, however, because the band was going on the road. Mrs. Haymes was expecting a baby, and Dick didn't want her to travel. So instead, he joined Benny Goodman's band, and stayed in New York until after their son "Skipper" was born.

In 1942, that was. Then, wanting to return to California with his family, Dick accepted an offer from Tommy Dorsey to replace Frank Sinatra, when Frank hit out on his own. Frank, by the way, had previously replaced Dick with Harry James!

"Frank stayed on with Tommy for a couple weeks after I joined," Dick says, "and we shared the same dressing room. We've been good friends ever since. Every time I bump into him now we rush out and eat spaghetti together."

After Dorsey finished his engagement at the Hollywood Palladium, Dick left the band. "Joanne and I figured I'd gone about as far as I could go, singing with dance orchestras, and that it was time for me to strike out for myself."

So he tried to get engagements in Hollywood as a feature singer. But no luck. His money was running out, so he sent Joanne and the baby back to New York, where they lived in a furnished room.

Helen O'Connell (the singer) was a good friend of Dick's and Joanne's. Knowing that Dick was having such a tough time, she talked her manager, Bill Burton, into handling him.

"Bill was wonderful," Dick says. "He moved Joanne and Skipper into an apartment in New York, and wired me a hundred and seventy-five dollars to go east. And he didn't even have my signature on a contract yet! I owed several thousand dollars to all kinds of people—strangers, tailors, stores, everybody. And Bill paid off all my debts. I just never had any sense of money at all. I still haven't. But now Bill takes care of everything and it's all right."

When Dick arrived in New York, things began to happen—and fast. Burton booked him into the La Martinique club, and he was an overnight click. Then he signed to record for Decca. All quite by accident, you might say. Jack Kapp, president of the Decca company, was listening to the radio one night and heard Dick on a record he'd made when he was with Harry James. Kapp called the radio station to find out the name of the vocalist. Next day, he got in touch with Burton, and signed a deal.

The first platter Dick made for Decca was "You'll Never Know"—which he sang with a vocal background, because the recording ban was on. The record became "number one" in the juke boxes, and sold over a million copies.

When an artist who isn't too well known makes a hit recording, radio and pictures usually follow. And Dick was no exception. Within a few days, he landed a coast-to-coast radio show. Then he was tested by Twentieth Century-Fox, and a long-term contract was the result.

So that's the story, past to present. The Haymes family lives in "the valley," in a rambling house with a pool. "I can't be very far away from the water," Dick laughs. "After the war I want to buy a schooner and get a couple of guys and go around the world again, I've already got Joanne's permission."

Skipper is a cherubic, tow-headed tot of two. His real name is Richard Ralph.

Now Skipper has a baby sister, Helen Lane, not yet two months old.

And there you have Dick Haymes. It took him twenty-seven years to get from Buenos Aires to a star-berth in Hollywood's heaven. But you can't say he's had a dull time, doing it. He's the "Rover Boy" that's made good. And how!

FARMER'S DAUGHTER

““Between Two Worlds,” “Dragons' Teeth” and “Wide Is the Gate”—which is a monumental reading-stint, in any man's language.

Donna's taste in literature, however, is widely varied. Book-of-the-Month Club selections, Ernie Pyle's “This Is Your War,” and Louella Parsons' “Gay Illiterate” are all grist for her mill. Just in the last couple of years she has become interested in art as a study, and is following a prescribed course of reading—ancient art, the masters, straight through to the moderns.

But besides reading, she likes to play records. She and her husband have a complete collection of symphonies and operas, as well as many piano concertos. For exercise, Donna likes bowling, playing badminton and sailing a boat.

Her conception of a perfect day begins with getting up at exactly eight in the morning, no earlier, no later. The alarm goes off at six, though, when she's working in a picture—just as it did when she lived on the farm. So eight o'clock is an hour of luxury.

The next step in her perfect day is her favorite breakfast. Strawberries and waffles. Then comes a long drive down to Laguna Beach. But that, too, is on the luxury list now, what with gas-rationing. It's been a long time since she's actually been there, but she thinks of it longingly. “I'm sure there can't be anyplace, anywhere, as beautiful,” she'll tell you. “Not even in the south of France, or in Italy, could there conceivably be a shore line as lovely, or a beach as beautiful, or water that wonderful color!”

Then next, on that happy, hypothetical day, there'd be a picnic lunch on the beach, a short sail, and a long drive home up the coast in the sunset.

It would be a good day, for anyone. And particularly for Donna Reed, for she's a fine girl, level-headed, normal and sincere.

As a child, Donna's parents would never allow her to go to movies. Until she was fifteen, she'd never been inside a movie theater. But she and her sister used to pretend they were stars, all the same. And for the week Donna was Jean Harlow, her sister was Nancy Carroll. They used to call each other “Jean” and “Nancy,” in all seriousness, and act out their “parts” in a game of make-believe that at times became thoroughly convincing.

The only star to whom Donna ever wrote requesting an autograph and picture was Anne Shirley, because she loved her so in “Anne of Green Gables.” Miss Shirley sent her the picture, too. And Donna thanked her in person, just a week or two ago, when they met for the first time at a Hollywood party.

Donna Reed is a hard worker, efficient about everything she does. She came to California with only sixty dollars to her name, registering for a secretarial course at Los Angeles City College. At first, she lived across town with an aunt, moving later into a furnished room, nearer the college. She put herself through school by working afternoons and Saturdays as a stenographer, paying her tuition as well as her room and board.

“The pickings were pretty slim, those two years,” she says. “Sometimes I didn't have any money at all. I couldn't ask them at home to send me any, because there'd been several seasons of drouth and there just weren't any crops.”

In Denison High School she had been elected Campus Queen in her senior year, and she appeared in the class play, “The Night of January 16th.” At Los Angeles City College, she was chosen Campus Queen in December, 1940, and was cast in two plays there, “The Intruder” and “Happy Journey.”

Less than twenty-four hours after her picture as Campus Queen appeared in the Los Angeles newspapers, three studios had called, offering her screen tests. But Donna refused them all, politely but firmly, saying it would be a lot safer to graduate from school first. Can you imagine such a thing? A chance at a movie career, and Donna turned it down. She'd rather make sure of knowing how to be a good secretary!

It was the wise girl keeping her feet on the ground. Why, she practiced her pot-hooks even after she'd received her diploma and been signed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Even with her name on the dotted line of a contract, she was keeping a weather-eye on the eventuality that she might not make good in pictures.

But she did make good, and rose to quick success in “The Courtship of Andy Hardy.” The greatest thrill she's ever had in her life came when, by chance, she drove past Grauman's Chinese Theater in Hollywood and saw her name out in front, in letters ten feet high.

But she's had disappointments, too, since starting her screen career. Probably the greatest let-down feeling she's ever had was the first time she saw herself on the screen.

It was in “The Getaway,” a B-picture, quickly made and not too well done. “I don't know what I expected,” Donna comments now, “but I certainly didn't expect what I saw! I knew it was Donna, all right—but yet it wasn't. I hope I don't feel as miserable and wretched again for a long, long time!”

Surprisingly enough, though, the local reviews next morning pulled her out of those depths of despair and had her walking on air. “The picture's only excuse for being,” commented the critics, “was the introduction of Donna Reed—who has the charm and appeal of a Janet Gaynor.”

This picture, too, was to prove more important in her life than she knew—for another reason. She'd had Bill Tuttle assigned to put on her first make-up—and she married the man, not quite two years later!

Unlike many Hollywood actresses, Donna has no ambitions to go on the stage. She things her work in pictures is enough. She wants to give her career five more years. And after that, she'd like to settle down in a comfortable home to a happy family life with plenty of children.

Maybe she will, maybe she won't. But if she changes her mind, or decides to extend the time limit on being a Hollywood career girl, you can bet she'll have a very good reason for it. Because Donna's like that—a determined little girl with plenty of good Iowa farm sense, keeping her feet on the ground and never counting unhatched chickens.

Make midsummer magic, says Yardley. Like tinting your skin with rosy-tan tones. Their new Rose Rachel powder was made to compliment all sun-kissed complexions and prove a dramatic contrast for pretty pastels or our snowy white playclothes. The powder come in a Bond Street box. Costs $1.

Addition — to Lentheric's Soft-Focus line. This time it's a cake make-up, offered in three popular skin shades, light, medium, and tan, all touched with rosy overtones. Its formula is the non-drying kind for a non-masking but lasting kind of finish. $1.50.

Shulton brings us news of a new dress. It's the charming Stiegel type bottle currently clothing Early American Old Spice perfume in fresh finery. Three sizes of the scent make their appearance in decorative daytime-evening design packages. $2.50 up.

Something sensational in paint! It's Schiaparelli's Radiance Lipstick, decked in Dali decor for special distinction. Pretty plastic, priced at $2.

Tayglo from Tayton. A departure in deception, this oily liquid base helps to cover and conceal. In four shades, Moonbeam (natural) Coquette (pinkish rachel) Conquest (warm-hued tan) Carribean (suntan) $1 each. Smaller sies are 25c and 50c.

Cutex cops honorable mention with a new shade of polish. Called Honor Bright, it's a potent, rosy red. Right for slick chicks, say they, with its gayety and glitter. 10c.

SO YOU'RE IN LOVE

"You can always tell the boys who are in love, when the mail arrives. The way their eyes light up when their names are called, the way they steal off by themselves to read their letters—it's a dead give-away.

"I want to say something, though, to the girl who writes her soldier a DEAR JOHN letter. These letters all follow the same pattern, and go something like this: I don't know quite how to tell you. I hope it won't hurt you too much. But you have been gone so long. I was so lonely, and I have found someone else.

"This happens all too often. When she's the only girl in the world for him, it's pretty awful. It's tougher to take than bullets or malaria. If she could only see how the heart has been scooped out of the man—well, at least she might have waited until he got home.

"The women at home who think they're having a tough time should have been with us behind the front lines, or seen a jungle army base. And if they could know how their men worry about them. Hear them saying: 'I wonder if she is well? Has she enough money? I hope she is having a good time.' While they themselves are living in hell holes and putting up with every imaginable discomfort and disease!

"The girls' letters would contain nothing but good cheer, if they really saw the whole picture. Yes, if they only knew. There would never be any DEAR JOHN messages to tear the heart out of a soldier."

Carole Landis, too, has some sound advice to give her American sisters. Carole, who's seen how the English, Scotch and Irish girls fell for our soldiers.

Enroute to North Africa, three days after her London marriage to Captain Thomas Wallace of the U. S. Air Corps, Carole had plenty to think about. ("Four Jills and a Jeep," 20th Century-Fox, is a movie version of the story based on her African experiences.)

"When I found myself headed back home, before Tommy and I had time for a honeymoon, I knew the fear that comes to all women who deeply love a man who may be killed in battle. And the thought of my handsome Tommy surrounded by those attractive London girls during his hours of leave—well, it wasn't too comforting.

"It is a well-known fact that American girls have the reputation of being spoiled darlings, as far as their men are concerned. I had seen how these overseas gals went for a little of this spoiling!

"But what to do about it? Away from your man, letters are the only connecting link you have. Unless you work hard at it, he can forget everything about you that once enchanted him.

"Don't pester him with little troubles. Believe me, your worries look darned little to him, from where he sits.

"After leaving Tommy, I tried to make my letters so personal that they brought him right to my side. I always described where I was, while writing to him. The studio, my dressing room, or at home. Since he had never seen my home at Santa Monica, I made a rough sketch of the floor plan. I marked in the windows, the chairs, the fireplace. I described the books and flowers and intimate things around the house. Later, I had interior photographs taken for him.

"And in writing to him, it was always the future—the time when we would be together. I made it seem that it was only that I planned for, that everything meanwhile was just 'marking time.' You see, the future is the only thing a soldier has to go on.

"Most of our letters were full of plans for our ranch that we expect to buy as soon as the war is over. It must be near an airport so Tommy can have his plane. We have figured out the number of stock, right down to the last horse and cow. The house plans will never be finished, I guess. We are always revising them.

"And we never tire of writing about the honeymoon trip we didn't get—to Ipswitch, England. The one we intend to take, after the war.

"Always I enclose a few snapshots. Tommy has pictures of me at home, at the studio, at the beach and with friends. I have a fetish for knowing about all the places he goes, too. It's like going along with him.

"All through my letters, I make crazy little sketches—of my dog, my friends, my radio, the book I'm reading, the dinner I'm eating—anything and everything that will show what I'm up to.

"And always remember, I LOVE YOU is the best news of all to your man, just as it is the most important part of his letter to you. He likes to read it just as much as you do.

"There is something about a letter from your sweetheart that makes everything worthwhile, whether you're in a front line trench or on your back in a hospital."

Yes, Carole, and you've Lieutenant Craig Reynolds backing you up on that point.

After ten months in Iceland, seven months in Guadalcanal and endless months in New Zealand, Lt. Craig says: "Letters from Barbara (he speaks of Barbara Pepper, who is now Mrs. Craig Reynolds), telling me of her love and that she was waiting for me to come home, made me ready for anything."

And that's from a man who's not usually one to say much about himself. You can't get him to talk about the fact that he was one of the battalion of Marines sent onto Guadalcanal for thirty-six hours, and staying seven months.

"I got too close to a bomb," he says, accounting for the brace he wears on one leg. And that's all. Nor does he talk about the months in New Zealand, when he managed to get around as an acting officer, having to throw his paralyzed leg ahead of him and just hoping it would hold him up. When it gave way, as it often did, he picked himself up, lighted a cigarette and went on about his business.

"It was the little intimate things in Barbara's letters that meant so much to me," Lieutenant Reynolds explains. "Although I never received a complaining letter, I knew plenty who did, poor devils. The boys in every unit know everything of importance that touches their buddies. Sleeping, eating, fighting and even dying as we do, side by side, we have few secrets from one another.

"When a buddy gets a DEAR JOHN letter, just as when he gets a bullet in his hide, we try not to make too much of it. 'What's the matter,' we rib, 'are you getting soft? Can't you take it?' When all the time we know how it is, and what others are thinking.

"Say, though, after months away from all civilization, I'll never forget how good the band sounded, and how fascinating the girls looked, the day we landed in New Zealand! Although many of our battalion were still sick from the ravages of dysentery and malaria, and others on the injured list with wounds. Private homes were opened to us, and let me tell you there were few of the boys who didn't take advantage of those invitations.

"The New Zealand girls reminded me a lot of the British. Same accent, same good looks and charm. Several boys in our unit were married over there. There were quite a number who came home engaged."

But Lieutenant Reynolds came home to his Barbara. "She's the only girl in the world for me," he says. She waited for her soldier to come home.

NEW PICTURE GUIDE

ALLERGIC TO LOVE (Universal) is about a situation that shouldn't happen to a dog. Martha O'Driscoll and Noah Beery, Jr., make the trip to the altar, and the bride discovers upon her first kiss that she is allergic to her husband. He gives her hay fever, and every kiss causes a spasm of sneezing.

The couple honeymoon in South America, and their unusual problem is added to by their doctor friend, who keeps reappearing as a rival to the bridegroom. Miss O'Driscoll, it should be added, is definitely not allergic to the medico!

The fun moves a little slowly at times, but on the whole you'll find it a nice way to spend an evening.

THREE MEN IN WHITE (MGM) The newest "Dr. Gillespie" film is a departure from the usual formula. Lionel Barrymore turns into a lovable old cupid, and instead of bending his efforts exclusively toward medicine, devotes himself to smoothing out relationships between Van Johnson and Marilyn Maxwell. Whether or not the Gillespie series fans will like the injection of this new note, we don't know. But "change is progress," and any such series is usually benefited by a new twist every now and then.

At any rate, it's refreshing, if not feasible, to find a cheery new note of romance and gaiety floating through the halls of Blair General Hospital.

THIS IS THE LIFE (Universal) marks the twelfth time Donald O'Connor and Peggy Ryan have appeared together on the screen, and the second with this pair for Susanna Foster. It's a young comedy-romance, with lots of music and a jump or two of jive. Donald loves Susanna, but she's struck with an "I'm a big girl now" complex and finds an older man more romantic. (Said candidate being Patric Knowles.) Louise Allbritton, as the sophisticated fem photographer, and poor little Peggy — they're threatened, till a happy-ending unraveling in a last scene finale, of being the "also rans." But you're never really very worried, because you're almost certain the whole thing will come out all right. And it does.

MAKE YOUR OWN BED (Warner's) is strictly slapstick fare, for those who like their comedy dealt them straight between the eyes. Jane Wyman and Jack Carson are the couple who, wanting to solve a big crime mystery so that they can start marriage with a bank account, hire themselves to the Whirtles (Alan Hale and Irene Manning) as a cook and butler combination. Carson can't "buttle" and Jane makes no pretense of knowing how to cook—but that's where the fun comes in. Another "servant problem" story, with a few Nazi agents thrown in just to keep the plot boiling in just the right way.

I TAKE THEE PAULETTE

nomination for the personality who least reminded people of a farmer's daughter.

The suggestion was too good to pass up, so the deal was made and Paulette (by long distance contact with her friend, Constance Collier, who took up residence on the farm) began to grow potatoes and other vegetables. Also, a thousand chickens were imported and dutifully set about creating an egg record.

Each development necessitated letters that flew from Hollywood to England, where Captain Meredith was then stationed, attached to the European Theatre of Air Corps Operations. At first, he kidded Paulette about her flier in horticulture and animal husbandry. But after the first balance sheets arrived, he began to evince a proper admiration.

In addition to conveying news of the farm in which both were interested, the letters accomplished something else. They revealed to each the mind, the spirit, the ambitions, the beliefs, and the sense of values of the other.

One day Paulette came home from the studio dead tired and fed to the teeth with drama. She flung into the house and stopped short. Lifting scarlet heads from a tall crystal vase were two dozen long-stemmed roses. On the table there was a card reading simply, "Burgess."

And after that, each week brought the same bouquet from the same man.

At Christmas time the romance hadn't clearly defined itself as that. Paulette, instead of planning, starry-eyed, on a gift for Burgess, wrote him a practical letter asking what she could send that would be of use to him. His answer was that he really had everything he could carry around, considering the army's idea of adequate equipment, although he thanked her sincerely for her thoughtfulness.

Miss Goddard, suppressing a grin, got busy. From her almost vanished stock of nylons, she selected three precious pairs and packed them into a slim box. To these she added half a dozen lipsticks of assorted shades. As there was space for one more small item, she added a box of vitamin tablets and a card reading, "To improve your social life."

Captain Meredith's shout of laughter almost echoed across the Atlantic.

The shout, a few weeks later, became hoarse and rasping; Captain Meredith came down with a fearful case of pneumonia. He had written to Paulette, complaining of sniffles and a sore throat, and when she didn't hear from him, she knew that something must be wrong. Days passed without word; weeks. The girl who had always been noted for leaving Providence to its own devices abruptly developed a worry complex that would have done justice to a school of mourning doves.

Eventually a letter arrived—postmarked "New York." He explained, in a rather wobbly script, that he had licked a goliath attack of pneumonia, and was now on detached duty in The States. There was an excellent chance that he would be sent to the west coast for some special service. Meanwhile, however, Paulette had com-
